ROSES.
[KATHARINE MELICK.]
For The Courier.

They grew on a tall, tall stem, so many of them, and so red. Clare had never seen such roses before. She had never seen any roses, indeed, before,—not any that she remembered. And these were so wonderful, she thought, with soft curling leaves, all folded over and over. What strange things they were, these flashes of red that had crept out, every morning a little more, from the soft green leaves to sparkle in the sunshine. And now there they hung, shaking softly on the long stems, "a whole many of them." Clare held her breath when she looked at them, and wondered if they would fall off.

By and by a great longing came into her little fingers, to hold one of the red, shining things. Could she really touch one of the soft leaves? Would they break? She reached up. They were too high. She looked at them again and slowly walked to the kitchen door where her mother stood ironing.

"Mother, can I have a rose?" Her mother was very busy. She turned her head quickly and her finger touched the hot iron. A quick frown wrinkled her forehead, and she said: "Oh, run away, Clare, and don't bother mother."

And Clare walked slowly away without looking at the roses.

Clare's mother went to the door and looked after her. She rubbed the frown out of her forehead with her burned finger, but she did not feel the smart. And then another frown came, more wrinkly than the first. She looked very angry with some one, but not with Clare for she called gently, "Clare, come here." Clare did not seem to hear. Her mother left the iron standing on a little lace-edged apron, and went to the door step. A very straight little figure in a gingham apron marched on before her. A blue sunbonnet hung back by the strings, down over two tiny brown braids. Her mother called once more, this time very plainly, "Clare, come! You may have a rose, child."

Clare walked on. She heard and she called back, without turning her small head, "I don't want any."

Then her mother went back and lifted the iron from the burned apron.
