Edmiston, Wehn, Barber, Bartlett, Kimball, Dale, Funke, Kennard, Benton, Earl Eaton and Grant Eaton of Madison and Dr. Orr.

Mr. Fred L. Kimball has modeled from life and photographs many excellent portrait busts of prominent Nebraska citizens. Beginning modeling for his own amusement when very young, Mr. Kimball later took a course of instruction under Professor Lorenzo Taft of the Chicago Art Institute, which together with his continuous engagement in the work of modeling and carving has developed his natural talent to a remarkable degree. Mr. Kimball does a great deal of modeling and drawing and carving for eastern wholesale granite and marble dealers, getting their ideas and putting them into form. He also makes the plaster casts for the manufacturers to be copied by carvers for their trade. Mr. Kimball has recently completed a large portrait bust of Doctor R. E. Giffen, which is remarkably true to life and deserving of unlimited praise for the beauty of execution.

Invitations have been issued by Mr. and Mrs. Rolland Hector Oakley to the marriage of their daughter, Pauline Maude, to Mr. Frank King Clark on Thursday evening, August twenty ninth at half after eight o'clock. It isn't the big troubles but the little ones which worry the life out of people. This year the bathers on the New Jersey coast are often driven from the water by the hosts of jellyfish which have invaded the breakers. The microscopic lances and poison sacs which cover the tentacles of these strange creatures get in their work as effectively as a hypodermic syringe, and there are thousands of them.

Northwestern Line.

THE HUMBLER TAKE A TRIP.

BY ELIZABETH.
(For The Courier.)

Marantha and I are come to that age when the wild woods, as a steady thing, or new and startling effects in scenery, no longer entice us. We want three civilized meals, a clean bed, a cool breeze, an easy chair for each, and the well-washed and amiably smiling face of humanity, close at hand.

We have no fancy for exile from any of these; on the other hand, we hate the brick blocks of the city in August.

There is a little town, not so very far away—a little struggling village, having no ambition to be called a city. Its streets go wandering in generous curves under old trees alike generous of shade and bird-songs.

Behold, Marantha and I arrived. The spirit of the place has breathed upon the solitary hackman, a gently-minded Dutchman—his horse as rotund as himself.

We jog to the door of our hostess of last summer and summers before last.

Yes, we are arrived, and the cool breeze is found, and the clean room, and here are the easy-chairs, each by its shaded window looking upon the quiet street of trees and gardens and scattered houses.

And if the cool breeze blows over kitchen gardens, so much the better. Our middle-aged noses like a whiff of old-fashioned flowers mingled with the homely odors of sage and onions.

Here we can live a peaceful life with not one of our middle-aged comforts lacking.

To keep us still linked to our city world, there is even a dot of a morning newspaper which we read over our toast and coffee with real cream. I say we truthfully; we divide the folds.

Marantha, the practical, the alert, who believes Change is Rest, appropriates the page of advertisements. And as she reads in a soft, murmuring tone, suited to the calm of the morning, half to me and half to herself, I catch a new glimpse of this dear Town of Every-Day Comfort from Marantha's standpoint.

You must know that Marantha's house-keeping garment, or captain's toga, or whatever, is never left at home. She clothes herself with the mantle of a gentle authority every morning, and when her foot strikes the quarter-deck of home, even this temporary home, she takes command of the ship.

"Ah," murmurs the voice, "here's the place for our linen! 'Sweet Lavender Laundry! Ladies' muslins personally conducted through the tubs. Negligee Shirts Never Starched!'"

"Ah," delightedly; "Here's where we'll spend an afternoon occasionally."

"Miss Ten-Spott will conduct a whist class at her home in Maple Grove, every afternoon from 4 to 5. Twenty-five cents a lesson, forty cents for two from the same family. Reduced rates for the course."

"Decidedly," said Marantha, "we need some expert teaching in whist. I've known for a long time our game does not compare with the young folks'. But how we will astonish them next winter in our club!"

"Oh, and my bonnets! 'Effie Daly, visiting milliner, makes up ladies' own materials at lady's homes. Studies face and advises styles and shapes."

"There," said Marantha, firmly; "none of my bonnets suit me. I'll have Miss Daly come for a day and have them all made over at once. Then my mind will be free for amusement. Listen to this: Miss Nellie Bly invites you to her Tuesday and Thursday afternoons. She reads, sings and gives musical sketches. Cool parlors at her father's home on Althern avenue. Admission fifteen cents."

"And here," said Marantha, excitedly, "let's drive out here often and often: 'Red Clover Farm, north of Every-Day-Comfort Town. Mrs. Polly Clover serves simple lunches at all hours. Home-made brown bread and milk ten cents. Dutch cheese and cookies fifteen cents. Served under the trees.'"

"This girl," said Marantha, "I know is a darling. We'll have her in for a regular going over before we leave for home. Our clothes will need many a stitch after our tramps this summer. For this is my vacation: 'Miss Cosie Help, mender. Lined coat sleeves. Mends lace and stockings. Darns torn clothing neatly. Terms reasonable.'"

"And these organ recitals. We'll not miss one of them: 'Twice a week, at twilight for half an hour, a pupil of Professor Diapason plays the organ in the Ivy church. Occasionally there will be a song by one of Madame Trill's pupils. Admission ten cents.'"

"It is a joy," said Marantha, solemnly, "to hear the organ. Not an overwhelming concert with a long, tiresome program, but the peaceful day closed by a grand, inspiring melody. You dear little pupils, whoever you are, how kind of you to think of giving us this pleasure!"

"Roses, sweet peas, grass pinks," reads Marantha with a shriek of delight. 'Leafie Lee brings to your door three days in the week, an old-fashioned posy of sweet-smelling flowers, such as roses, sweet peas, grass pinks, etc. Ten cents a bunch.' We'll have a bunch on every window-sill," said Marantha. "And we'll remember this summer as the Festa of Grandmother's Flowers."

It was reported that hundreds of horses died of the heat in St. Louis. By actual count the number was nine. Doubtless it was a St. Louis boy whose "thousand cats" turned out to be "our cat and another one."

The less men think, the more they talk.—Montesquieu.
