SOCIETY

The secret of unfading loveliness has been discovered by an American woman, says a writer in The London Mail. She had become weary of the monotonous process of applying an artificial bloom to her cheeks day after day, so when in London she went to a "fashionable tattooist" and asked him if he could tattoo "a nice, healthy color that would stay there all the time."

The artist in pigments was startled, but said he would try, and proceeded to experiment on his own ankle with a pigment about the color of rouge, and after a week of close and careful observation, he succeeded in obtaining the exact tint for facial application. He furthermore discovered that it was necessary to grade the coloring, and by repeating the process over the pigment already inserted, he was able to secure a perfect imitation of the glow of health.

The American then returned, and to her great delight was informed that if she was still determined to go through with the operation, the tattooing could be successfully done.

"Even then," said the tattooist afterward, "I was very nervous about it, for I knew that if it was a failure nothing on earth could ever remove the evidences of the blunder. However, I yielded to persuasion, and set to work with the finest needle I had, and some carefully prepared color. How closely I watched the effect of every insertion of the pigment and what a state of anxiety I was in until the second tattooing had been finished, I shall always remember; but the result was a success beyond anything that either of us expected. The American looked at herself in the glass and went away delighted beyond measure with the cleverness of her own idea."

One of the fads at eastern resorts is the affectation of announcing brilliant functions, where the most elaborate preparation possible for the size of her house or her purse has been made by the hostess for her guests, as little affairs. A "small dance" means as many hundred guests as may be crowded into a ball room, and a "little dinner" includes at least one hundred guests.

One of the recent fads of society women is to have gardens made upon tables in dining or drawing-room. These gardens are not merely collections of flowers in pots, but consist of exquisite minute living models.

The trees employed are the wonderful dwarfed Japanese oaks, yews and maples, which at the age of fifty or sixty years frequently are not more than a foot in height. Tiny Alpine flowers of various species are used to fill the two or three inch flower beds, while the turf lawns and grass walks are represented by bright green Lilliputian moss.

In many cases owners of parks and gardens in the country are having sections of them duplicated in miniature for the drawing-rooms of their London residences, a costly proceeding, and one necessitating unlimited care, as the deviation of an inch from the plans would throw the whole garden out of proportion. Waterfalls and streams two or three inches in width may be made to meander under four-inch bridges and through towering six-inch bamboo plantations. The only item in these miniature gardens in which the sense of proportion is lacking is the fish which swim about in the streams and lakes. The smallest fish available is a goldfish an inch in length, but this in accordance with the scale is much larger than a man, a state of things which, despite fishing stories, does not exist in the fresh waters of Great Britain.

The marriage of Miss Pauline Maude Oakley to Mr. Frank King Clark at Holy Trinity church on Thursday evening, brought out the smart set in large numbers. The young and the not so young were out in force, wearing modish gowns. The bride was regal in a French gown of lace, and the bridal veil was of the same beautiful material. The beautiful matron-of-honor, Mrs. Thomas W. Griffith, the four bridesmaids and the flower children lent a pictorial effect to the scene. The ushers were men with grace and ease of manner, and their courtesy contributed greatly to the enjoyment of the occasion.

The color scheme was white and green. The chancel and altar were banked with palms and white carnations; the rood screen also was covered with ferns and white carnations. On the screen were hung wedding bells of white carnations, while on every pew was an immense bow of white ribbon and a wreath of asparagus fern.

A pretty reception followed at the home of the bride's parents. Above the high green hedge surrounding the grounds were hundreds of Japanese lanterns enclosing electric lights. The bride and groom received the guests under wedding bells of white carnations surrounded by a bower of green. The walks and driveways leading to the house were canopied in white, and here many of the guests danced to the strains of Hagenow's orchestra, which was stationed on the upper balcony. From this balcony, amid the strains from "Romeo and Juliet" the beautiful bride threw her shower bouquet to her girl friends below. The bouquet was caught by Miss May Burr amid shouts of applause. At the rear of the lawn was a tent in which the bride's and groom's cakes and ices were served from an immense round table laid with lace and garlanded with green. In the centre of the table was a tree of asparagus fern surrounded by bride's roses. The table was lighted by six silver candelabra, and the tent by Japanese lanterns. Coffee and lunch were served on the lawn in bowers made in the shrubbery.

The wedding gifts were displayed in the dining room on tables covered with white velvet. The gifts were numerous and very beautiful, consisting largely of cut glass, real lace and silver. The groom's gift to the bride was a magnificent ring of diamonds. Mr. and Mrs. Clark will sail in a few days for Paris, where they will make their home.

Mrs. and Mrs. J. W. McDonald gave a luncheon and porch party Sunday evening in honor of Miss Oakley and Mr. Clark. The table decorations were of La France roses and the ices were in the form of pink hearts with a small cherry on each. Champagne punch was served later in the evening. The guests were Miss Oakley, Mr. Clark, Mr. Whedon of Chicago, Mrs. Griffith, Cadet Owen H. Oakley, Judge Magoon of Washington, D. C., Miss Zegna Harod and Mr. Frank C. Zehrung.
