BEDTIME THOUGHTS.

Our little Blue Eyes is going to bed,
But never alone goes she;
For Dorris and Dorothy over the way
In nightgowns white I see,
So here is a thought for your dear little head:
Across the street they are going to bed.

And through the town, where we cannot look,
They are going to bed by the score,
Till I seem to hear, "Good night! good night!"
Passed on from door to door.
So here is a thought for your small, curly head:
All over the city they are going to bed.

And the thousands of children throughout the land,
As westward the sun goes fast,
Will say their prayers and climb into bed,
Till all will be sleeping at last.
Now here is a thought for your wise, little head:
Thousands of children will soon be in bed.

And all over the world, as the sun journeys on,
An army of girls and boys
Will don their nightgowns and say good night,
Leaving their games and toys.
Oh, here's a big thought for your small, curly head:
Millions of little ones tucked into bed!

Mrs. Oldfam—That set of china belonged to my great-grandmother.
Caller—Did it, really? Why, I have not a single piece that belonged to my great-great-grandmother.
Mrs. Oldfam (distantly)—Indeed!
Caller—No. We always kept servants, you know.—Ex.

Troyer & Gingery UNDERTAKERS

Farmer Greene—One o' Josh Medder's summer boarders skipped out without settlin' and Josh is tickled to death.

Farmer Brown—How's that?"

Farmer Greene—Why, Josh had been tellin' everybody that th' feller wuz a foreign nobleman, an' that proves it.—'Fuck.

REUNITED.

Chance never figured in a prettier romance than that which has reunited Frank Parrish and his young wife, and brought to them the delights of a second honeymoon.

The man and his wife were living in Galveston, Texas, at the time of the terrible tidal wave of last year. They were caught in the flood and separated. The man was nearly drowned, carried across the bay, and lay an invalid in the house of a stranger for weeks. The wife sought him hopelessly for days, then donned widow's weeds and went to the home of distant relatives at Murfreesboro, Tennessee.

The man, as soon as he had partially regained his strength, sought among the ruins of his home for his wife's body. It was not there. He widened the circle of his search, but never did he find a trace of her. Disconsolate, sick, weary of life, he went to the ranch of a brother near Roswell, New Mexico.

Chance drawing the wife to this state a few days ago reunited this tragically parted couple, and, happy in their reunion, they are spending their second honeymoon on the brother's ranch.

When the Galveston flood swept over the city both Parrish and his wife were at their little home. As the water rose they clasped each other in their arms. Then their house was lifted from its foundations and the merciless waves swept the husband and wife out into the darkness, the flood and the storm.

The husband swam bravely, shouting for help to the winds which whistled their derision. His arms grew weak; he could feel his wife slipping, inch by inch, from his embrace. He could feel that his swimming stroke was impotent against the waves.

Then he sank. The water closed over him. The chorus of the winds was drowned by the strange, harsh music of water rushing into the ears. He choked. He felt the breaking of his last faint hold upon the woman beside him.

Then all was still.
When consciousness returned to Parrish he found himself in a farmer's house on the main land. The farmer told him, bit by bit, of the terrible havoc the storm had wrought, and of his miraculous escape from death—being buffeted across the bay and thrown upon
