FROM REAL LIFE.

The people who laugh or cry over the funny or sad things in books, scarcely ever realize that there are things in real life, even in our very midst, equally as humorous or pathetic.

A Courier representative was walking through one of the nicest residence districts of the city the other night, and saw a very pitiful sight, a sight that one would always remember. An intoxicated man was coming up the street, staggering from one side of the walk to the other. He was a man in the prime of life, and very handsome. As he neared one of the pretty cottages, through the curtains of which could be seen bright lights and prettily furnished rooms, a little girl ran to meet him.

She looked like any other little girl who would be waiting for her papa to come home from work. She was fresh and clean, her hair was tied with blue ribbons, and her white apron was spotless, and starched stiff.

She lifted her little mouth for the usual kiss, saw his condition, and helped him up the steps to the top of the porch, where he sank down, a miserable, drunken human; while she leaned against the house and cried—her little heart was broken. The wife and mother opened the door, and helped him in.

As the witness to this little scene walked away, the child was still outside, sobbing in the loneliness of her sorrow.

"What makes you so anxious to go to Europe to live?" "My patriotism," answered the quizzical person; "I am not a man of superabundant means, but I like everything that is American, and I want to go abroad, where I can purchase American products at the least possible expense."—Washington Star.
