and capacious mind could picture Omniscience from creation.

If there is solution for this perplexing riddle, if there is compensation, his wholesome life has earned the right to taste the sweetness of eternities.

The answer to affection is not silence, the end of love is not the grave, nor is the vaster purpose of life blasted in the bud at the very hour it should break into bloom.

Did we dare assert the thought that life here commences and here ends, the farthest butt of all our sail, it would be renegade to all that endears life, a travesty on creation, a mockery of family affection and a sacrilege to that whisper of God to woman, when, of all His jewels, he gave her motherhood.

The sting and bitterness of death is in the sudden and awful separation; in the reach of hand, to find it closes upon an empty palm; to imagine the foot fall of his feet along these halls, within this chamber, when all echo has deserted them and Silence with finger on its mute lips, stands warder, guarding his old and favorite haunts. Gentlemen of the Bar, the pitted forces in this arena, the judge, the impaneled jury, the bailiff, the idle spectators, in expectancy may listen, but no more the lion like gladiator shall fling his challenging gauntlet down.

We speak for his brothers of the bar who knew him and gave him affection for affection, and especially for the younger members, for whom at all times he has shown the highest regard and given his assistance. We speak for the splendid bar of this state; we speak for the great people who shrouded his corpse with their Love and rained upon his coffin lid their sobbing prayers. All who knew him or his life mourn his departure and well they may for a great commoner is dead.

His life was a mighty warfare, but his victorious arms brought to camp only captive friends and trophies of affection. Wholly without malice, revenge, envy or hate. His anger like a lightning stroke came through an April shower. In his impassioned vehemence at its climax, he sent forgiveness with his anathema and hurled his threat from an open and velvet hand. In all the gentle offices of life, he was tender as a woman, simple as a child, outpouring his abounding charity and far reaching brotherhood upon the distant tribes and races of men, as he gave to friend and neighbor.

When duty called or occasion required him to champion a menaced or invaded right of the people, white plumed, another Henry of Navarre, he plunged into the thick of the fight; in denouncing a wrong, he burned as vitriol on the unscarred flesh, and in protecting the helpless he was a lioness defending her whelps.

He has sounded, defiant and clear, the clarion note of liberty and has voiced its apothegms, grand as the Star Spangled Banner is potent to move the patriotic blood, as the chant of the Marseillaise is to time a Frenchman's feet or the Watch on the Rhine to dim with tears the eyes of German Fatherland. An eloquent and powerful orator, debater and lawyer; he was, as many and many of us believe, in diction and eloquent speech, the superior, and in devotion and zeal to the cause he advocated, the peer of the great political chieftain he so delighted to honor.

Mr. Overmyer for a score of years, advocated principles of government that were not then dominant or politically popular; he advocated them in the face of established power, and on a field where the entrenched allies of the spoilsmen held the vantage ground. He fought with the sun in his face, challenging them to a duel unto death. Wherever, over that field the conflict raged, his trumpet gave no uncertain sound of battle. Above blandishment, beyond corruption, he fought the fight. He lived to see the reforms and principles he so cherished and advocated, engrafted in the platform of each of
