Columnists

Continued from Page 20
A syndicate brochure quotes Simon as saying he gets his ideas from everywhere. "They come from what I see and what I hear and what I feel and what I think."

At the age of 34, columnist Bob Greene has racked up quite a few honors.

He is nationally syndicated by the Chicago Tribune-New York News Syndicate, Inc. He has won two journalism awards. He was recently named a contributing correspondent for ABC-TV's "Nightline," with freedom to choose his own topics.

He has written five books, contributes a monthly article to Esquire magazine and has written for Newsweek, Harper's, Rolling Stone and Sport.

Greene is a graduate of Northwestern University in Chicago. While in college he was a campus correspondent for the Chicago Tribune and went to work as a city reporter at the Chicago Sun-Times upon graduation.

In 1978, after two years at the Sun-Times, Greene started his column.

Author-journalist Gay Talese said of Greene: "In the declining art of column writing for newspaper, Bob Greene is one of the few who bring a high level of readability, perception and variety to daily journalism — and done it so often."

Newsweek called Ellen Goodman's column, entitled "At Large," one of the most unusual in the country.

Goodman, a 41-year-old staff member of the Boston Globe, writes about the subjects at the heart of reader's lives.

"The major stories today are the family and what I call life and death issues," Goodman says. "After the '80s, people lost faith in public solutions. Now they are turning to what they can control."

Goodman started at the Globe in 1967. In 1980, she received the Pulitzer Prize for distinguished commentary. Her column, distributed by the Washington Post Writers Group, is published in more than 300 newspapers across the country.

The columnist is a Radcliffe College graduate. She has written a book on social change called "Turning Points" and has had two collections of her columns published.
