Phones to aid campus security

Three police emergency phones to be installed by Friday will provide added security for UNL students, according to UNL Police director Gail Gade.

The phones are connected directly to the UNL Telecommunications Center. A person requiring aid need only knock the receiver out of its cradle and an officer will be sent to the location, Gade said.

Two emergency phones installed previously, one at 19th and Vine streets and one placed near Architectural Hall, have been successful in providing help, Gade said.

The phones are placed where students have voiced concern about the possibility of an assault, Gade said.

Gade said the existing emergency phones haven't been used extensively, but that is good.

"I think having an emergency phone in an area has a preventive effect," he said.

The new emergency phones are being installed at 14th and New Hampshire streets, 14th and S streets and on the west side of Avery Hall, said Ruth Michalecki, director of the Telecommunications Center.

The new emergency phones are on trial, Michalecki said. If the trial is successful, as many as 25 phones will be installed around campus.

Abuse of the existing phones has been limited to a few false reports and some vandalism, she said.

Michalecki said she is confident the phones will be useful to assault victims, as well as students with car troubles.

Science mini-courses offered

In an effort to increase the public's general interest in life sciences, the UNL School of Life Sciences is offering six mini-courses for the spring 1983 semester.

"They're essentially an experiment for Life Sciences," said Royce Ballinger, interim director of the school. The mini-courses were offered for the first time this semester.

Mini-courses are shortened classes that last five weeks and usually present material of general interest in particular fields. They are worth one credit hour each. The courses are presented in small, non-threatening environments in which there is usually no competition with majors in the field, he said.

Most students consider mini-courses an opportunity to take courses outside their regular curriculum without a big time commitment. Ballinger said. He said the life science courses will be offered during three periods in the semester and can be added by students at any time before the courses begin, although registering for any or all of the courses during early or general registration time is recommended.

"A lot of things are going on in the world that well-informed citizens ought to know about and understand - in areas that impact society in general, in the field of biology for example," Ballinger said.

Among the classes being offered are human genetics and a course titled "Life On Earth," which will focus on the material presented in the Public Broadcasting Service program of the same name. This course is offered in two parts, the first from Feb. 15 to March 17 and the second from March 29 to April 28.

All mini-courses will be taught by instructors who volunteer to teach them in addition to their normal course loads. Topics are chosen by the instructors themselves.

From a faculty standpoint, Ballinger said, the courses are an opportunity to come in contact with more of a cross section of students and to teach in areas of personal interest to themselves. He said so far, faculty and students have shown interest in the courses.

City may help in renovation

The city of Lincoln might provide up to $694,600 in funds to renovate the old Brandeis building at 11th and O streets, said George Chick, director of the Lincoln Urban Development Department.

The city is working with the Cherry Hills Development Co. to remodel the Brandeis building, now known as Gold's Galleria.

Chick told the Downtown Advisory Committee at its meeting Friday that plans for developing Gold's Galleria should be submitted to the Lincoln City Council before the end of the year.

Under the plan, the curb along 11th Street would be widened to form a new bus terminal that is being planned by the city. Chick said this would close one lane of traffic along 11th Street.

Chick said the breakdown of funds is tentatively as follows: skywalk structural enforcement, $50,400; demolition work on sidewalk and curb removal, $16,700; reconstruction of the street portion of the bus terminal, $207,600; landscaping, $27,900; ornamental lighting, $18,400; other amenities, $44,400; Lincoln Transportation System bus shelter, $299,500; utility repair, $9,700; and street graphics, $11,000.

The total proposed cost for renovation comes to $685,600. Chick said an additional $9,000 was allocated for budget runovers.
