To the Public

The World-Herald is embarrassed.

For the first time in our history we have to ask the people of this vicinity not to subscribe for The World-Herald unless they are already taking it, as the War Production Board is severely limiting the amount of newspaper that this newspaper can have, as it is doing with all other newspapers.

As a rule, the circulation of The World-Herald goes down each summer 4,000 to 5,000 on account of people going on vacation. For some unknown reason, this year the circulation went up 4,000 to 5,000 during the summer, and as it always goes up in the fall, the probabilities are that if we had the paper the circulation of The World-Herald would be over 200,000 by December.

Unfortunately we haven't the newsprint, and we are not going to have it. So we have had to freeze our circulation at 190,000, and we are forced even to cut off between 4,000 and 5,000 of what we now have.

The remaining old subscribers of The World-Herald, whether by mail or carrier boy, will continue to receive the paper. We merely ask that those taking the paper by mail renew their subscriptions promptly so that they won't be dropped, as, if they are dropped, they will have to take their chances with the waiting list.

People who are not subscribers, we ask not to subscribe at the present time, as we haven't the paper with which to serve them.

Frankly, we don't look for any improvement in this situation. We are afraid it will get worse, as there is quite a shortage of labor in the wood cutting industries and in the paper plants.

To those who are now taking The World-Herald, we give them assurance that we will try to maintain in full the news coverage which we now give our readers. We are refusing advertising and holding it down all we can so as not to interfere with the news columns of the paper, and this practice will be continued as far as we are able.

Kruger was in jail on a thirty-day sentence imposed on August 23 for being drunk and disorderly and resisting an officer. The officers have a pretty good idea as to who helped him escape and they are keeping their eyes open for Kruger and his aide, in the hope that they will be apprehended within a few days. Kruger, when apprehended, will probably have to do additional time for jail breaking.

DO THEY REALLY?

The Coming of the Monster

Less than two hundred years ago man's life was centered in his own village and in his own family; he had a trade and taught it to his sons; he owned his own tools and a bit of land—or else had the use of land. Then men realized that the germ of any community is the family, and that it has certain rights which must be respected. But a cloud began to settle over Europe towards the end of the eighteenth century—the smoke of the factories and mills—the Industrial Revolution came and man had to change his mode of life.

Steam supplanted the horse, man worked in a factory conveniently located for shipping, and he gave up his little home to move into tenements. The father, and often the mother and the children, spent long hours in the factory. Family life was gone and new troubles arose. Did the working man have any rights? Was big business a law unto itself, or should the state regulate it?

A "hands off" policy was adopted by the state toward the changes that had taken place. The industry had all the rights, and the worker had none. The industrialization of the world went on; it faltered at times and we had minor depressions and panics until finally came the world-wide collapse. Then the need of stringent regulation was seen and the socialization of industry began to take place.

The ideas behind this movement were not new. Men long had groaned under the injustices caused by the Industrial Revolution, but in correcting them they departed from the principles of justice as based on the natural law. The first manifestation appeared in Europe where conditions were worse. There we saw a strange thing arise from the wreckage of the World War—the absolute state.

Men unite to establish a social institution for the protection of their individual rights. That institution is government; men give to it only some of their rights. Therefore, ultimately, states owe their very existence to individual rights. Hence, it follows that governments exist to secure and not to destroy the rights of individuals. Thus the absolute state repudiates its own origin and betrays the purpose of its creation.

The absolute state as we see it today does just this: it maintains that the state exists for the good of the state; that the good of the state comes first, and that man exists for the state. What a perversion! Instead of a benefit, it is a monster devouring individual rights until man stands alone, stripped of his dignity and power.

As the defender of man's rights and the champion of justice, the Catholic Church has been and is opposed to this freak—the absolute state. In a long series of letters the Popes have been instructing the world on the rights of labor, the rights and duties of parents, the need of true education—all of which are necessary to check the growth of this monster which, eventually, can only burst of its own greediness.

For further information on the Catholic idea of the state and society, or for authoritative information on any Catholic question, write to Catholic Information Society, 7800 Kenrick Road, Saint Louis, Mo.
