

Firemen of the Fleet

During times of peace or war there is one foe eternally feared by every man that goes to sea—fire. In wartime ship fires reach their maximum deadliness. Ignited by enemy shells or bombs, the flames menace personnel already busy at battle stations. Also, every man called from his post to fight fire gives the enemy that much more advantage. Thus, the navy has founded fire-fighting schools to train specialists in the art of extinguishing fires anywhere aboard ship quickly and methodically. Fire-fighters train aboard imitation ship sections built on land in which fires can be ignited for teaching purposes.

SOOT SUITS might be a proper slang term for these weird looking asbestos suits and oxygen breathing apparatus. These student firemen are equipped to fight a fire below decks.

AT ANNAPOLIS midshipmen fight a test blaze. Fire-fighting is part of their regular training.

INFERNO—A member of the fire-fighting school is almost veiled from the camera by smoke arising from a roaring blaze below the decks of a training ship.

TONGUES OF FIRE that flash out 40 feet are ignited at school. Inset: A Briton and Yank attending same fire-fighting school.

DOWN THE HATCH go asbestos clad fire-fighters and soon a blaze spreading below will be out.
