WOULD TAKE CROOKS OUT OF BIG MUDDY

Plattsmouth, Neb.—(UP)—A plan to straighten the Missouri river from the Union Pacific bridge at Omaha to the Burlington bridge at Plattsmouth, as the first step in preparing a navigable channel, has been outlined by Roy N. Towl, Omaha engineer. His plan has been submitted to the government engineers at Kansas City. The fall in the river from Plattsmouth to Nebraska City is 50 per cent more than it is from Omaha to Plattsmouth, he declared.

"Yet this does not enhance possible navigability. The current is practically the same just below Omaha as it is below Plattsmouth," Towl explained. "The shortening, if it materializes, will cut the river from 25 to 17 1/2 miles between the two points."

The river has wandered over a bed four and a half miles wide at a point south of Bellevue, and Towl showed how this land could be used to advantage and how centralizing of current will be necessary when the channel is constructed. More than $1,250,000 has been spent by the government and the Burlington railway in unsuccessful attempts to restrict the stream's meandering, he estimated.
