"MISS GOODNOUGH? Telegram from Parkville, N. Y., to Miss Alice Goodnough, Hampton, Vt. 'Will you board friend of Richard Jones for August?' I. R. Howard."

SHORT STORY "Very well, Mr. Stevens. Please take this telegram: 'To I. R. Howard, Parkville, N. Y. Will board you for August. When will you arrive?' Alice Goodnough."

Alice Goodnough hung up the receiver and rushed through the dining room with its long table set for dinner.

"Mary, you'd better let the dishes go until noon, and run upstairs and tidy up the southwest chamber. A man is coming sometime soon, and I'm going to put him there. You'll have to run the vacuum over the floor and change the bed and the dresser scarves, and—well, you'll see what needs to be done."

Mary, plump, good-natured and seventeen, took the stairs two at a time. "Ladies, we're going to have a real he-man boarder here."

Mary's voice was not very penetrating, so it must have been the nature of the news which caused three bedroom doors to spring open and three fair maids to dash out, in various stages of undress, to accost Mary.

"When's he coming?"
"How old is he?"
"What does he look like?"
"Search me. All I know is that he's coming and is going to have this room."

"Whee-e-e!" Above the noise of the girls dancing around, the door-knob of the corner room was heard to turn. But when Mr. Alexander Stone thrust his skull-capped head out of the door to enquire gently, "Did you call, Mary?" Mary, alone in the hall, was demurely taking sheets from the linen closet.

"No, Mr. Stone, I did not."
"Oh, well. It was probably some psychic sensation that made me think so."

With that, Mr. Stone retired to his room, to continue his work on his new book, "The Psychology of the Farmer and His Family."

Downstairs, the telephone rang again. Another telegram. "Will arrive at Heath's Corners 2:42 p. m., Aug. 2. I. R. Howard."

Miss Goodnough hung up the receiver with a sigh of relief. Her house would be full and, thank goodness, this one was a man.

How she did hate these young women who glanced everything over cynically and refused to be surprised at anything! And the older ones! They were worse—always hanging around the kitchen volunteering grandmother's recipe for sour milk doughnuts, or Aunt Sue's never-failing recipe for dumplings. But a man—gosh, that was good!

The next noon, as she served the mashed potato and creamed dried beef, she officially announced the coming of I. R. Howard. Mr. Stone hoped that he would be psychically inclined. Miss Pratt wanted to know what time he would arrive. She might take him for a walk and show him the beauties of the country. The three young members of the company showed no interest in hearing that he would be at Willowdale Farm on the bus which came about 3 that afternoon.

But Jerry, the farm manager, doing odd jobs around the piazza, was not the only expectant one when the bus came in. In the hollow down by the brook could be seen Miss Eva Knapp in a bright red bathing suit. Not, as she remarked that night, that she would have soiled her new bathing suit in that dirty brook, but she thought it better that Mr. Howard should realize that, if he cared to go swimming in the pond a mile away, he might have company.

In the summer house, shaded by the redolent vines, sat Geraldine Fitzhugh, rocking gently in the wicker chair and holding Marjorie Allen, infant daughter of the neighbors half a mile to the east. Geraldine just loved children and, besides, a Boston artist had once told her that she would make a beautiful Madonna.

In the tennis court to the left was Marta Waldo, trim and sleek from her boyish bob to her white tennis shoes.

The bus was heard coming up the hill in low. Jerry allowed himself the luxury of thinking of fishing trips on rainy afternoons and someone to knock around with on Sundays in his new $590 car, f. o. b. Detroit. Eva walked slowly along the bank of the brook looking for the best place to go in. Geraldine sang a lullaby sweetly to the baby. Marta began to play her best, utterly confounding poor Mary.

The bus stopped. Three pairs of eyes received their daily doses at the corners. They knew from experience that the passenger would have to disentangle himself from anything from canary seed to a cream separator. Things with which the driver was wont to fill his small car.

A gray suede shoe and a trim-looking ankle came cautiously out upon the running board. It was followed by the rest of a slight girl clad completely in gray.
I. R. Howard had arrived!
