"Detailing" of Lieutenant Colonel Philip Fleming, United States Army, as Administrator of the Wage-Hours Act, directs attention to the growing tendency recently of President Roosevelt to name military and naval officers to posts traditionally held by civilians.

For instance, not so long ago the President even went into the army to get a secretary, naming his military aide, Brig. Gen. Edwin M. Watson, to the trio presiding over the White House offices. Then there was the appointment of Rear Admiral D. Leahy, United States Navy, retired, as Governor of Puerto Rico.

Of course, the best known of such appointments was Colonel F. C. Harrington, United States Army, as Administrator of the WPA. But there are others. The President named Rear Admiral Christian Joy Peoples, United States Navy, to be Director of the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department.

Heads Maritime Commission
Rear Admiral Emory S. Land, United States Navy, retired, is chairman of the recently created United States Maritime Commission and Rear Admiral H. A. Wiley, United States Navy, retired, is a member of that commission. The Maritime Commission has jurisdiction over this country's commercial shipping—not over any of the armed services.

These were revealed by a quick glance at the directory of government officials in civilian departments and agencies. It is not an all-inclusive list—nor does it take into consideration army and navy officers in subordinate positions, such as Lieutenant Colonel Brehon Somerville, WPA administrator for New York.

Of all these appointments only those of Admirals Land and Wiley seem in harmony with American tradition. This country always has been a peace loving nation. It has abhorred the military spirit and it always has kept the army and navy under curbs. For instance, it is traditional that a civilian should always head our War and Navy Departments.

Given to "Crack-Down"

This is not because of any deficiency in our army and navy officers. Most of them are outstanding in ability and character. But they have been trained to be army and navy officers—they have been imbued with a militaristic spirit—they are exponents of "crack-down." Down through the years our people generally have believed for these reasons that militarists should not be placed in charge of civilian functions.

President Roosevelt, on the other hand, always has been military and naval minded. He likes army and navy officers—not only because, as some say, they take orders—but because the Presidential mind runs in that direction. He likes autocratic authority, regimentation, and planned economy. He has, on occasion, been sympathetic with proposals for universal conscription. Ever since he has been President the Navy Department has been his pet. He likes to run it—even now leaving it without a Secretary of the Navy, so he can hold that portfolio himself.

So it is not unnatural that when a vacancy in a civilian agency occurs the President thinks of military or naval men to fill it. On his behalf, it is said he has named army and naval officers because he thinks them best qualified for the job at hand. But that is quite a reflection on our civilian population, saying, in effect, that there is not a civilian in the country qualified to be a WPA Administrator or Administrator of the Wages and Hours Act.

Labor Becomes Uneasy

The "detailing" of an army officer to administer the Hours and Wages Act has caused some uneasiness in the ranks of labor. Organized labor always has been suspicious of the militarists. Its leaders do not like iron-fisted and "crack-down" tactics and then, they never know when the army may be used against their followers.

Labor is not the only group with misgivings about the Fleming move. Industry, too, is disturbed because of the general war background and the many plans which the government has for regimenting the country in event of war. Some wonder whether the naming of Colonel Fleming is part of an elaborate plan for placing the country on a war basis, under the direction of army officers.

At all events, the placing of two major Federal agencies—the Hours and Wages Administration and WPA—under the direction of army officers seems to be nothing to cheer about. It is a situation which should be watched closely by the people and Congress.
