FLIGHT THAT FAILED TEMPORARILY . . . Mel Patton, U. S. anchor man, is shown as he whisked past the finish line in the much disputed (hence famous) 400-meter relay race in the London Olympics. Although Patton finished yards ahead of the British runner who came in second, field judges disqualified the United States relay team for illegal passing of the baton outside the 20-yard zone and declared the British team the winner.

Armed with righteous wrath, American officials entered a vociferous protest of the ruling, contending that the baton was passed from Lorenzo Wright to Barney Ewell in a completely legal manner. A subsequent showing of slow motion pictures of the race verified the U. S. stand and the judges altered their decision, declaring the American team was the winner of the race.
