Teen Tattler —

Mary Devine: 'All College Girls Don't Look Like Pages from Harper's Bazaar'

By MARY DEVINE BRENNAN

Hi Teenagers! This week's chatter concerns you sophisticated seniors, so read carefully.

You're pretty important people this year. For eight more months you'll be the big shots on the campus. There'll be the senior class play, your last football homecoming, your last music contest, your basketball tournament. There'll be class night and graduation day, too. There's a big year ahead and you're looking forward to it.

After graduation is another matter. It probably seems so far away that you haven't given it much thought. But if you wait until after high school is over to worry about what comes next you may find that it's too late—especially if you're planning on college.

You've all heard that colleges and universities are overcrowded and that's not just something someone dreamed up to keep a conversation going. It's very, very true so, if you want to be a college student next year, you'd better get busy—now.

If you aren't sure which school would do the most for you (all colleges are not the same; each has its own "best field") write to the registrars of the colleges that interest you and ask for catalogues.

Have your parents and your high school teachers study them with you and help you make your choice. (You'll find that the schools with highly advertised social life have little else to offer, so don't be too impressed with publicity pictures.)

When you do decide on a college (and decide as soon as you possibly can) fill out your registration papers and send them in.

Filling out a registration blank isn't the only preparation you'll need for next September. You'd better do a little extra studying, too.

Senior year is usually the easiest in high school and most of us, being reasonably sure of a diploma come May, are inclined to relax a little learn the necessary things, and let the rest slip by. Don't, please don't do that.

For a lot of you this is the last year of formal education. Remember that a lot of the people in the cold, cold world you'll face next year are pretty intelligent people, and you'll need every bit of knowledge you can cram into your high school head to keep up with them.

You future collegians will find that college is a brain-strainer for anyone—even little Sir High School Honor Roll himself.

There's a lot of fun to be had in college, but you'll miss it if you have to spend your time studying the things you just skipped over in high school.

College is not what books and movies picture it to be. Night clubs, big football games, red convertibles, and house parties are just the frosting on the college cake and very thin frosting at that! College girls don't always look like pages from Harper's Bazaar and college men are not all the ski-sweater and pipe-smoking type.

In college you'll spend more time on term papers than on dancing; more time on book reports than on picnics.

You will burn the midnight oil preparing for psychology tests far more often than for "after-lights" parties in your room.

So — go into college with your bright eyes open and with all the knowledge you can possibly pick up in high school. All the time you spend studying now means that much more time for fun next year.

In spite of the work, college is fun, so write for those catalogues now. You can't go to college until you find a college to go to.

The teenagers at Senior high here in Dubuque have a new fad that brings back memories of S. D. bracelets and wartime "dog tags." The kids are all wearing dog collars (small ones) on their ankles.

Each girl has hers engraved with her name, the boy friend's, or both, and the really hep-co-ed has a different dog collar to match each sweater she wears.

The boys say that the collars are good for keeping trouser legs out of bicycle chains. Could be! See you here next week.
