Out of Old Nebraska —

First Nebraska Fish Story Found in Journal Kept on Lewis and Clark Expedition

By JAMES C. OLSON

In these degenerate days, Nebraska's fishing grounds must be stocked regularly if the state's anglers are going to enjoy any sport at all. In old Nebraska, though, the fishing was fine—and with benefit of limits, hatcheries and closed seasons.

Many of the diaries kept by explorers, soldiers, traders and emigrants tell of days spent fishing in Nebraska's streams. It was a favorite amusement on Sunday's, and at all other times when rest rather than travel was the order of the day.

But for those early Nebraskans, fishing was much more than amusement. It was a means of securing fresh food, and providing a welcome supplement to the standard diet of bacon, beans and coffee.

On military expeditions, the soldiers frequently were assigned to a fishing detail; and the Mormons organized committees to fish the rivers to provide food for the destitute.

Considerable ingenuity was used in catching fish. The seine was a favorite device, although scoops and baskets also were used. The story is told of a group of trappers who, having gone some time without food, found a large safety pin in one of their blankets. They quickly bent the pin into a hook and braided a line of hair taken from the horses' tails, with the result that they soon had a pan full of fresh fish, plus an additional supply for future use.

Probably one of the first fish stories to come out of Nebraska is that recorded in the journal of Lewis and Clark, who ascended the Missouri river in 1804. On August 15, at a camp just north of the Omaha village, they dragged a small creek dammed by beaver, catching "318 fish of different kind . . . pike, bass, salmon, perch, red horse, small cat, and a kind of perch call Silver fish, on the Ohio."

Captain Clark, whose spelling is wonderful to behold, also reported that he caught "a Strimp prorsissey of Shape Size & flavour of those about N. Orleans & the lower part of the Mississippi."

The next day their luck was even better as they caught "upwards of 800 fine fish, 79 Pike, 8 salmon resembling Trout . . . 1 Rock, 1 flat Back, 127 Buffalow & Red horse 4 Bass & 490 Cats, with many Small Silver fish."
