FEAR AN UPSWING IN HOG CHOLERA
 Is another upswing in hog cholera losses due this year?
 Since this disease first swept Ohio a hundred years ago, it has tended to recur in cycles. The peak of these cycles is reached about every ten to thirteen years. Even during the low point of occurrence several thousand outbreaks are usually reported, with estimated losses up to $20,000,000.
 Veterinarians and livestock health officials are deeply concerned that cholera may flare badly this year, especially as the cycle is now long overdue. Contributory factors are failure to seasonally immunize thousands of herds because of unfavorable market outlooks, the heavy carry-over of unvaccinated brood sows, and a general let-down in sanitation and husbandry methods because of the farm labor shortage.
 Common danger signals of a pending outbreak are: The death of one or more pigs; failure to eat; a tendency to hide in the litter; weakened hind legs, staggering gait; gummy eyelids; discolored skin.
 There is no way to forecast when or where hog cholera may strike. Often the first symptoms are mistaken for less serious hog ailments. Yet delay may result in total death loss of all swine on the farm. The only safe procedure, and the most inexpensive insurance policy against cholera losses is proper vaccination of all susceptible swine on the farm even though no hog cholera is known to exist in the immediate neighborhood. That seems to be especially sound practice this season.
