BLOOD CELL DISEASE KILLS MANY CATTLE

Some twenty years ago a Kansas veterinarian identified a blood disease of cattle, previously unknown in the United States. The disease "anaplasmosis" or pasture sickness is in many ways like human malaria, for it is caused by a tiny parasite which attacks the red blood cells. Today, this disease has reached serious proportions—is now present in at least 23 states and has also been identified in sheep.

Anaplasmosis is spread from the blood of one animal to another in a variety of ways. It may be transmitted by mosquitoes, biting flies, and ticks. Outbreaks have also been traced to improperly sterilized dehorning shears, castrating knives, and contaminated hypodermic needles. Any object which contacts blood of an affected animal, then punctures the skin of a healthy animal, may transmit the disease.

Symptoms include a quick drop in weight and general condition and sometimes jaundice. The eyeballs, lining of the mouth, and skin of the udders may have a yellow color. On examination after death, all tissues are abnormally yellow and the gall bladder greatly enlarged.

Veterinarians are well acquainted with the areas where anaplasmosis is known to occur with frequency. Hence, any sickness of this nature noticed in newly arrived animals or in home herds on pasture should be investigated immediately.

There is no vaccine or serum as yet developed to prevent anaplasmosis, hence it is important to avoid introduction of the disease into new territories. Owners should also remember that recovered animals act as carriers for a long time. Ridding animals of ticks protection from flies, and extreme care in using vaccinating and dehorning equipment are essential in prevention.
