Experiments Show Milk

RUTH HOFFMAN,

Recent research by Dr. C. A. El-vehjem of the University of Wisconsin to determine the pellagra-prevention action of certain foods, notably corn and milk, have proved that milk rates very high, the National Dairy council announced. It has been known since 1925, Dr. El-vehjem said, that pellagra was due to the deficiency of an unknown dietary factor. In 1937, Dr. Elvehjem and associates demonstrated that this unknown factor was nicotinic acid or niacin, one of the B-vita-

Since use of corn as a food has been associated with pellagra for more than 200 years, Dr. Elvehjem conducted his experiment on rats and dogs with a diet consisting largely of corn grits. In one, the corn diet was heavily supplemented by niacin. These animals gained 77 grams of weight daily. Another test group was fed the grits with only enough niacin added to equal that present in whole corn. The weight gain was only 37 grams daily.

Establishment of "eye banks" in a few days after receipt of eyes.

That there are not millions of persons with cloudy corneas is one of the great achievements of nature. The cornea is a transparent inch long, in the front part of the covering of the eye. The balance of the eye's covering, known as the sclera, is opaque. Thus, most of the skin of the eye is clouded and nature seldom forgets to have the opaqueness stop at the corneal area.

The cornea of the human eye is very important in the bending of light to a focus on the retina. It contributes about two-thirds to the refractive powers of the eye, as compared with one-third for the lens. In a sense the cornea does
