African Violet
The African violet has earned its wide popularity because it will bloom for many months at a time when happily situated and properly cared for. It takes a place in a north window and plenty of water; but like any other plant, it can have its roots rotted away if water stands in the pot. Subirrigation is the best method for watering this plant. Stand the pot in a saucer of water occasionally, and let the soil become thoroughly wet. Don't water again until the surface looks somewhat dry. The foliage is easily marred by water. Cold water on the leaves will cause white or light brown marks, and water of any temperature on the leaves, coupled with exposure to sunlight, will cause a burn. For safety's sake, keep the foliage dry.

Ancient Dolls
From the dawn of the world, the everyday play dolls were usually made of wood, which has vanished into dust, so that it is only the clay dolls which have come down to us from earliest antiquity. About 1100 B. C., the foundation was laid of a stone temple in Persia into which bystanders threw all manner of toys and dolls which have been unearthed. Among them was a little wooden doll that kneaded dough on a breadboard when a string was pulled. Time has decayed the threads, but the manner of joining the various parts together with animal glue was the same as is now used in the manufacture of modern dolls.

Eye Fatigue
It is hard to concentrate the attention of the eyes on an object for any length of time without fatiguing the eyes, according to the Better Vision Institute. This can be demonstrated easily. Make a dot upon a piece of paper and move the paper away from the eyes to a distance where the dot is barely visible. Concentrate upon the dot. Soon the dot will disappear and reappear. The flickering usually is rhythmic, with the period of fluctuation varying from 3 to 25 seconds in different individuals. Another common test to demonstrate visual fatigue is to paste a piece of black paper on a white disc. When revolved a faint gray ring will be just noticeable. The ring will come and go several times a second.
