Ewing People Up to Their Ears in Business and Mud'

Sixty Years Ago (September 8, 1887)

We nad the pleasure of visiting the lively little town of Ewing one day last week. Ewing people were up to their ears in business and mud. We called on Messrs. Strong and DeWolf and found these accommodating gentlemen busily engaged in attending to the wants of their customers. They are gentlemen with whom it is a pleasure to meet. We also called at the Bank of Ewing where we were entertained for a short time by Messrs. Costelyou, Ege, and Vanzandt. After disposing of what business matters we had in view, we naturally drifted around to item cilice, and chinned Mr. Bohn and his assistant until train time.

Out of Old Nebraska -

Congress Propositioned on Moving Capitol to Kearney

By Supt. James C. Olson, State Historical Society

the early 1870's there was a movement on root to remove the national capitol from Washington to Ft. Kearney. Nebraska!

Ft. Kearney, guardian of the Oregon Trail and protector of the settlers in central Nebraska during the 1850's and early 1860's, had been abandoned as a military post in 1871. Into the discussion over what should be done with the reservation, Moses H Sydenham, noted Nebraska pioneer and editor of the Central Star at Ft. Kearney, injected the idea that it be made the national

He advanced his proposition in the editorial columns of his paper, sending copies to members of Congress, and to influential people all over the country. The reasoning behind his idea sounded good, at least to the residents of central Ne-

Would Promote Settlement He argued that the transfer would promote settlement of the West, with immigrants coming not only from the crowded states of the East, but also from abroad. Ambassadors, businessmen, and others from foreign countries would have an opportunity they did not have with the capital located at Washington. Then, too. in case of a foreign war, a capital located at Ft. Kearney would be immune from attack. (This was before the development of the atomic bomb, it will be remembered.) Further, Ft. Kearney was the ideal site because, like the District of Columbia, it was just 10 miles square. Such a transfer, it goes without saying, would have been something of a boon to the neighborhood, and it is re-ported that at least one man bought two sections of land from the Union Pacific on the strength of it. Congress, how-ever, couldn't see the light, and in 1876 the Ft. Kearney reservation was disposed of in a much less dramatic fashion. It was opened to settlers un-der the Homestead Act.

The capitol moving fever fired up by Mr. Sydenham did not die immediately. There were a number of cities in the west who looked favorably on the prospect of begovernment. In 1874 a national capitol removal con-

First Council with Indians 143 Years Ago

The first American council with the Indians in what is now Nebraska took place on August 3, 1804, just 143 years ago. The American representatives were Meriwether Lewis and William Clark, then on their famous journey of discovery and exploration. The Indians were Otoe and Missouri chiefs. The site was "Council Bluff," probably near the present village of Ft. Cal-

This council was conducted in accordance with instructions from President Thomas Jefferson, who was greatly concerned with extending this country's influence over the natives in the territory re-cently purchased from France as well as learning more about that territory itself.

Lewis and Clark had come up the Misosuri river from St. Louis. Before their journey was over they would follow that river to its source and go down the mighty Columbia to its mouth on the Pacific shore. Their journals (copies of which are in the State Historical society's library) record their plodding, weary course across the West. Goodwill Gifts Exchanged

The explorers first encountered the Missouri and Otoe chiefs on the evening of August 2. They informed the Indians they were glad to see them, and would talk with them tomorrow. As evidence of their good intentions, they gave them some roast meat, flour, and meal. The Indians responded with a gift of watermelons. Despite these gestures of goodwill, however, the journal for that day states: Every man on his guard and rendy for anything." The next morning after The next morning after breakfast they met in a full-dress conference. Captains Lewis and Clark paraded their forces before the Indians and then delivered long speeches, telling the chiefs what they could expect from the new government. The chiefs apparently were satisfied with parently were satisfied with what they heard, because the journals record that they responded with long speeches of their own, agreeing to the proposals set forth, and ex-pressing their hap iness that they now "had fathers which might be depended on.'

Natives 'Astonished'
After all this, Lewis and Clark gave the Indians a cannister of powder, a bottle of whiskey, some paint, and a few medals to seal the bargain. Then Capt. Lewis fired a few shots with the air gun which, according to the jour-nal, "astonished the natives."

The conference being over, the exploring party set out upon its journey, proceeding about five miles up the river to their next camp.
