A Message Out of the North

"We worked together and helped one another." These words of Rear Admiral Perry are the essence of how a polar voyage was consummated a quarter of a century ago. In that far north region of snow and ice and perpetual frost it is a case of working together and helping together or perishing. It is a place where the welfare of all is the welfare of the individual. Each member of the expedition is a unit of the whole. Even the dogs share in the common welfare.

If that spirit, that attitude, that sentiment is needful—is vital—to a polar expedition, will it not work elsewhere? If essential to the few making up an exploring party, why not to the many making up the community in which we dwell? Are we so absorbed in our plans and schemes to get more and more for self that antagonism is fostered and hindrances created?

A good many propositions are put forward as a solution of the difficulties of the times. The great explorer's words come to us, being applicable here and now as ever they were in the polar circle, "we worked together and helped one another".

The athletic commission at the state university comes under the scope and disfavor of the caustic pen of the editor of the Daily Nebraskan. It was something of a surprise to learn of a university man with the nerve to denounce football, and he now takes on the larger job of exposing the folly of the whole athletic program. And he will have a lot of fathers and mothers out over the state ready to cheer for him.

"Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man."
