Savannah Church Is Shrine of Methodism

TRINITY WAS ERRECTED IN 1848, BUT ITS HISTORY DATES BACK TO WESLEY'S VISIT TO TERRITORY MORE THAN CENTURY EARLIER

Trinity Methodist church, in Savannah, Ga., called "the mother of them all."

By NEA Service Savannah, Ga. — Its origin directly traceable to John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, old Trinity Methodist church here is known as the "mother of them all" in reference to its history as a seat of Methodist teachings.

Wesley planted the seeds of Methodism in England where he and a group of earnest young Oxford students called themselves "Methodists" because they taught a doctrine of service to others. His brother, Charles, already was in America, associated with Oglethorpe, governor of the colony.

On Oglethorpe's invitation the brave young Episcopal ecclesiastic came to America late in 1735, arriving at Savannah in February, 1739. Here he remained until December, 1737, when he left to return to England via Charleston.

Despite his earnest religious work in Savannah, there was a society of only 17 persons to keep the embers of Methodism alive when he departed. The original building in which they held services disappeared long ago and the one that succeeded it is now a private residence.

Another was erected, re-built for the third time in 1848, chartered by the Georgia legislature in 1849 as Wesley Chapel and had its name changed to Trinity Church in 1850.

While in Savannah, John Wesley also established the first Sunday school in the world, antedating the Robert Raikes Sunday school in England by 50 years. It was in Christ Church Episcopal the school was established. A great Episcopal church now stands on the spot.

Alarm Interrupted Firemen's Billiard Game Eau Claire, Wis. — (UP) — The billiard game of Fire Chief James P. Welsh and former City Clerk John C. Fennessey on the second floor of the fire station was interrupted recently by an alarm. The chief slid down a pole, jumped into his car and raced to the fire. Fennessey, accustomed to such interruptions, left the billiard balls where they were, awaiting the chief's return. "By the way, where's the fire?" he asked the call boy some time later. "At 815 Fifth Avenue," the boy replied. "That's my house," shouted Fennessey and dashed down the street. He met Chief Welsh returning, however, and after being assured that no damage had been done returned to resume the billiard game.

Boy's Appearance Fooled Traffic Cop

Naugatuck, Conn. — (UP) — The traffic officer thought the youngster playing nearby was pretty thinly clad for such a cold day, and advised him to go home and get an overcoat. "Who, me?" queried the boy. "Say, look at here." And while the officer looked the boy began fumbling with buttons. Surgeons Rented Valuable Radium

Glasgow, Mont. — (UP) — For 24 hours a valuable supply of radium was "rented" by a local physician recently. The radium, needed for emergency treatment in a cancer case, was shipped to Glasgow from the Chicago syndicate of surgeons who own it. The rental charge was $65 for use of 100 milligrams. This was much less than the probable cost of sending the patient to Chicago for treatment, the Glasgow physician pointed out. The shipment was sent by registered mail. A portion of the radium was enclosed in a silver box the remainder in silver needles.

GLORIOUS ERA IN AMERICAN HISTORY

Shining Examples of Human Bravery and Sacrifice That Marked the "Winning of the West."

When we think of the great western trails and the march of the covered wagon our minds naturally turn to the feats of the heroic Whitman, the tragedy of the Donners and other occasions which called for the acme of human bravery and sacrifice. And yet, Franklin F. Korell, writing in the New Republic, reminds us, we ought not to forget that the real achievement of the trail and the settling of the great western empire were the result not of a few heroic deeds, but of the steady advance of a great body of earnest and determined men and women who were anxious to find a new home in the wilderness, for it was of such as these that the great western empire was built.

The sweep of emigration to the western country came in successive waves. At the beginning of 1841 the Oregon country had a white population of perhaps 100 men, women and children, nearly half of whom were attached to the missions. It was in the same year that the tide of immigration really set in and the man to organize the first real emigrant party, known as the Western Emigration society, was John Bidwell, an adventurous New Yorker, whose name is not unknown in the building of his adopted state of California.

Early in the year the Bidwell party, consisting of 69 men, women and children, organized by electing John Bartleson captain. The majority of the party were determined to go to California, although it finally divided and went in three different directions. Later accessions raised the number of the party to 81.

After a long journey the party reached Soda Springs where a band of Catholic missionaries who had joined the emigrants set out for the Flathead country in Montana. The original Bidwell party, now 64 in number, divided, half setting out for Oregon, the other half being determined to go to California.

The year 1842 brought a real wave of emigration to the Oregon country. The prime mover was Dr. Elijah White, a former missionary to the region, who early in 1842 was appointed an Indian agent for the Oregon territory by President Tyler. Like most emigrant movements of the day the assembly point was near Independence, Mo., where the party organized on May 14, electing White captain, and James Coats pilot. One of the leaders was Amos Lovejoy, who, a few years later, was to accompany Marcus Whitman on his historic winter ride across the Rockies in a successful effort to save the Oregon country for the Stars and Stripes. The party consisted of several covered wagons and 107 persons.

The first large emigration came in 1843 and for this reason the period is called the year of the great migration. It was inspired by Whitman's efforts in the East. There were over 200 families, 120 wagons and a big supply of live stock. Efforts of the Hudson's bay officers at Fort Hall to turn back the emigrants proved unavailing, because of Whitman's encouragement, and they finally arrived in Oregon.

In the succeeding five years, train after train of emigrants set out for the western country, some to California, but most during this period to Oregon. Four trains, one including 800 persons, went in 1844. And in 1845, the number increased, more than 8,000 persons covering the Oregon trail, while a much smaller number went to California. Emigration to the following territory picked up somewhat, however, in 1846. Then came 1847, with an even greater boom, nearly 5,000 going to Oregon, and the Mormons covering much of the same route on their way to Utah. The Mormon movement continued in 1848, but with this year, the first phase of emigration closed. The new Pacific era was commencing.

Jumbling of Old and New Found in Persia

Asia presents to the traveler a jumbled picture of age-old customs side by side with modernity. Dr. Maynard Owen Williams, only American with the Citroen-Haardt Trans-Asiatic expedition, told members of the National Geographic society in an address at Washington.

Modern ways and machines, he declared, have worked their ways with Persia, and the traditional blooded horses upon which Persians once journeyed, have given way to automobiles and buses. Trucks have usurped the caravan routes, once traveled exclusively by camels, and mail and passenger planes roar overhead. But, adhering to age-old custom, Persian women still appear publicly only under heavy veils. Afghanistan was less marked by western influences.

Crossing the Himalayas, he said, it was necessary for the party to abandon its modern mode of travel and take to ponies, yaks and camels, crossing the Chinese Turkestan border.
