stantial evidence in our courts of law especially where a life is placed in jeopardy. No effort at showing the fallibility of this type of evidence is made here, merely circumstances which occurred, and, if you do not believe they occurred, we can and will show you the very places where all this happened.

In a village, let us say Hay Point, having a population of about 160, not counting fence posts over 30 years of age, a little girl of about 56 years sat down to inveigle the white fluid from a certain part of a certain cow in a very uncertain manner. As she milked the girl thought of her sweet-heart.

The cow was engaged, ah, hem, not to anyone, but in cuddling her chew, meaning of course, chewing her cud. Cows, it may be explained, delight to chew their cuds. To chew that of another is considered extremely ill bred manner by the producers of milk.

Without thinking much about it the milk maid jumped up, grabbed a milk stool by a hind leg and swung it viciously at a yearling mosquito that had set up an oil derrick on the south forty of the cow. The girl missed the mosquito and struck the cow on what is known to us students in Latin as cabooseicus rumpicus.

Suddenly the cow elevated her tail, jumped a three-wire fence, entered the kitchen of a nearby residence, made a new front door, went across the street, and on the way bumped into a sleepy team of horses hitched to a load of loose hay. The horses lurched, upset the hay on a leading citizen who happened to be lighting a cigaret, the hay caught fire, the fire siren sounded, the fire truck slammed around a corner, crashed into a truck loaded with fowl, and there was cackling, quacking and gobbling and domestic birds flopping and running all over the village.

Wilbert Adkins glanced out a window. There was a bank robbery, he thought, so he picked up a shotgun raised a window and succeeded in decorating Silas Dawn, president of the First National bank of Hay Point.

Silas did not think there was a bank robbery; he knew it, and in a few seconds the burglar alarm bell on top of the building pounding call to arms and men came from this and that direction. Near-sighted Ed. Petersing saw a stranger carrying a gun and he let him have a free sample of No. 10 shotgun slugs only to find out later there is no open season on preachers carrying a cane.

The preacher started running toward a doctor's office and while going around a corner collided with Sarah Shortwaddle, superintendent of his Sunday School. The woman, went down almost, at the feet of her husband who, certain now the bank was being robbed and still more certain there is a hell of flaming brimstone, angrily beat a retreat and came back with his old goose gun which had been guaranteed to stop anything and everything within sight of the man behind the butt plate.

Heavy firing now was shaking the atmosphere of every part of town. The cashier of the bank madly dashed across Squirrel Squeak avenue and he was roundly peppered by his best friends. This man thought it about time to become excited so he clumsily swung his gun around to get quick action, the thing went off and so did one of his best great toes.

This is a strange world and strange things occur. A band of seven true bank robbers came around a corner and looked and wondered if another gang had outguessed them and secured the loot they had counted on getting.

Silas Dawn painfully mounted a barrel, loving hands placed in the middle of the street, and asserted in his sugar coated yet thunderous voice that there was no bank robbery.

"The bank is not being robbed," he assured the astonished populace, "it is not—"

"Come on in here, old bay window!" There was nothing else to do. "Now open the vault and do it quickly!"

A robber heaved a smoke screen bomb to the street just before the fire truck rolled around a corner.

The fire siren sounded a second time and soon two sets of hose were forcing water into the bank building; the chief not knowing they were all but drowning the leading citizen, ordered a third line laid.

Quietly the robbers left thru a rear door and the bank president again mounted his barrel and told a crowd there had been a robbery and that the loss was all of $10,000.

An automobile swung around a corner near the town, struck a cow concealed in flying dust, the machine jumped, turned over and four men lay dead and three wounded and in need of first aid.

The milk maid came and looked at the wreckage. A question she could not answer is this: "Was it thru the girl's being unkind to dumb animals that men lay dead and dying?" Legally she felt herself not liable, but morally, she was in doubt.

The bank recovered its money and the populace went back to the ways of civilization. Not one of the people of the village died. This question still confronts the woman: "Did I, thru an act of carelessness or anger, directly or indirectly, cause the deaths of human beings?"

THE GOVERNMENT HOG PROGRAM

Nebraska Farmer: In a speech on the floor of the senate, Senator Carey of Wyoming opposed a processing tax on cattle. Among other arguments he pointed out that such a tax on hogs had not worked to the benefit of growers.

During a six months period prior to the floor of the senate, $45,000,000 had been spent in one way and another to bolster the hog market. Despite these large outlays and the destruction of 6,000,000 little pigs and many thousands of piggy sows, the market had not been able to add the accumulated processing tax of $2.25 to the retail price of meat. While sheep had advanced from $6.98 to $9.36 per hundredweight and cattle had nearly held their own at $6.75 compared with an earlier price of $7.35 (tops)—neither of these being taxed—hogs had declined from $4.75 in October to $4.44 in late February; and declined nearly another cent after that, while cattle prices continued to rise.

Among the unprejudiced it has been generally admitted that the hog processing tax has been taken out of the grower. But there is more to the story than that. What might have happened to the price of beef had the same amount of money been spent in bolstering it up? The implication is very clear that the determination to make the hog experiment look good resulted in a larger expenditure there than was justified compared with what was done for other equally important meat products.

Scores of south Holt county flowing wells, long dry, are now flowing.
