Seeding Grain Sorghums

Since the new ruling relative to the planting of forage crops, hundreds of inquiries have been received by agricultural agents and to the agricultural college about varieties of grain sorghums, methods and dates of planting and similar problems. Experimental work of the college of agriculture, field tests made by farmers and agricultural agents, and experiences of those farmers who have grown sorghums in the past are being drawn upon now to get the best information.

Atlas sorgo, a variety developed in Kansas, has proven popular and profitable over most of the south central part of the state. In 1933, it matured satisfactorily for silage at the Valentine experiment station but it requires a 125-day growing season to mature seed. Atlas should be planted at the rate of 15-18 pounds per acre when listed and grown for silage in eastern Nebraska. Farther west in the state, the rate may be decreased to 10-15 pounds per acre. When drilled, the planting rate in eastern Nebraska should be 50 pounds or more per acre, while in the western part of the state the rate may be cut in two.

Regular corn planting plates are not satisfactory for planting Atlas seed. Blank plates drilled with a number of three-eighths inch holes are generally used by farmers in eastern Nebraska. The holes should be reamed out on the lower side to prevent clogging.

Well matured silage is about as satisfactory cattle feed as corn silage. Shepherds regard it as better silage than corn. Horsemen say Atlas is good winter feed when fed as dry fodder. Atlas does not make safe pasture since it sometimes contains the same poison as cane.

Farmers who want to grow sorgum only for grain should use pink kafir which is recommended for southern Nebraska along the Kansas line, and western black-hull kafir for the counties farther north. These two varieties are the most widely grown grain sorghums.

Campers At O'Neill

It must be a year since covered wagon campers stopped at the grounds just north of the Northwestern stockyards, and, strange enough, two outfits composed of about eight automobiles and wagon-houses pulled in there at the same time last Friday evening. A cub reporter rushed into camp to find if some young city had emigrated because of drouth or high taxes. Then it was revealed that each half of the campers knew nothing of the other half.

The east camp was under direction of Ben Jones, of Fulton, Mo., and with him is his wife and three children. Mr. Jones said he may buy a herd of Dakota horses and drive them to Iowa, Missouri and beyond where they would be offered for sale.

The west camp was under direction of E. L. Suter, who lived at Tilden many years and who knows nearly everyone in O'Neill. He camped here many times. With Suter is Bill Hendrick, of Hays, Kansas. Members of the several families in this camp said they were just traveling with no definite destination in mind.
