A farmer in this vicinity shot a barn owl and quite a number of folks out this way had the opportunity to see it. The barn owl is sometimes called "Monkey Faced Owl." Its face is white with a facial rim of white feathers with tips of orange buff and resembles a monkey's face very much. The rest of its plumage is whitish-tawney flecked with black. It builds its nest almost anywhere in barns, hollow trees, holes in steep banks and deserted nests constructed of a few sticks, hay, bones or other refuse. The barn owls are always hungry. They can eat their own weight in food every night and catch as many mice, gophers and other ground creatures as a dozen cats. For this reason it is difficult to find birds that are more useful about any farming community.

Checking Of Corn-Hog Compliance Underway

Corn-hog supervisors have officially started checking compliance of the corn-hog contracts. They will attempt to have all contracts checked by the first of September. This consists of measuring the corn acres where there is a chance of considerable corn being harvested and a preliminary count of the hogs. When the supervisor calls on a producer the following information should be available.

1. Disposal of hogs that were on hand at the time of the neighbor's count.
2. How many pigs have been farrowed since December 1, and what has happened to them.
3. The number of feeder pigs bought and sold.

4. Pages 8 and 9 of the Triple A Record Book should be filled out showing the dates, weights, and from whom purchased or to whom sold of all hogs bought or sold since the neighbors count was made.

Each producer will be notified when the supervisor will call and he should make it a point to be home on that day.

Western Idea Of Tugwell

Dr. Tugwell, in his speech, suffered, perhaps, as our stage friends say, from too strong a buildup. The people came prepared for something extraordinary; they saw and heard something quite ordinary.

Three expressions we heard after his speech may be typical of the general reaction. One was: "He's a typical, mild mannered, classroom Socialist." Another was: "A man as harmless looking and anemic as that can't start any revolution." The third was: "He is too short on oratorical ability to inflame any one to revolutionary excitement."

A significant section of his talk was his reference to the necessity for cooperation in the program now under way in order to avoid a dictatorship. This seems to be the theme song of the New Dealers. They say we must take what they are preparing for us or give way to Fascism or involuntary regimentation of some sort or other.

Frankly, that attitude is displeasing to us. It embodies a confession that the old order of things under which America progressed and prospered for 150 years is to be discarded without further consideration.—Sioux Falls, S. D., Argus-Leader.
