Whether the administration victremendous expenditure of federal money for relief, and benefit projects, as many opponents claim, or whether it was due to the confidence of the people in President Roosevelt, or both, the fact remains that the voters were for the New Deal and the New Dealers are in the saddle in a firmer way than any party has been in three-quarters of a century. It is true, of course, that in 1912 the Republicans carried but two states, yet the fact remain that there were two Republican tickets that year and Mr. Wilson was, after all, a minority President from 1913 until 1917. But there is no such condition in evidence today. The fact that the New Dealers carried the rock-ribbed state of Pennsylvania and gave the Republicans a scare in Vermont is

The question of the hour is, of course, what is going to happen next? Now that the New Dealers have won their victory what will they be able to do with it? The people having spoken it will be up to the successful candidates to do something more than speak.

eloquent evidence of what has hap-

One significant fact is that this was not an "old-fashioned" Democratic victory as we knew them in the old days. It was a victory for a new system of government, a victory for regimentation, for paternalism. Shortly before the election the newspapers gave us the information that the administration was veering toward the right. We were told that the ship of state would now be steered on a more conservative course.

But in view of the election results it remains to be seen whether such a course can be maintained. In every state and in every district the disciples of the New Deal pointed with pride to the amount of money which Uncle Sam had been spending in that state and in that district. The voters were told that if they wanted the flood of gold to continue, they must vote for the candidates who were supporting the New Deal. The voters have indicated that they want the stream of gold to continue. Now what else can be done about it? The task of stopping the flow, of moving toward a balanced budget, toward less regimentation and more private initiative, is going to be a very difficult one. It will require all the skill of the President, presuming for the moment that he does !! desire to veer to the right rather than to the left. It will be a movement against the tide, and against an irresistable tide at that, one made irresistable by the very fact that many of those elected in the New Deal avalanche will be demanding the expenditure of more money, rather than less, the inauguration of new and untried remedies for those which, during the past two years, have failed.

The Republican Party has temporarily at least fallen on evil days, but a considerable and healthy faction of the Democratic Party has fallen on evil times, too. It was a New Deal victory, not a Democratic one. The Republicans will either have to quit or redouble their efforts, building anew from the very foundations. It is evident from the statements of the leaders that they will not quit. Their path will be hard and the sacrifices to be made will be great. The result of the landslide on November 6 would indicate that the New Dealers # should have things their own way in 1936. In normal times an offyear victory means a presidential victory two years hence. But these are not normal times. Because of new policies, greatly increased Federal expenditures and constantly changing currents of thought we are moving twice as fast politically ! and economically as we did a generation ago. Time alone can tell payments have been made since
