TRANSPORT COST BARS RICE FROM HUNGRY PEOPLE

Because of lack of economic transportation, certain sections of China which have been blessed with a superabundance of agricultural crops have not been accessible as sources of supply for foodstuffs for famine sufferers in certain other areas, Julian Arnold, writing in Asia Magazine, tells us. In 1932 and 1933, Hunan province produced unusually heavy yields of rice; in fact, it was so difficult to find markets for the excess production that Hunanese farmers were described as being "rice poor." At the same time, in the adjoining southern province of Kwangtung, large imports of rice were made from abroad, at lower costs than those at which the thirty or forty million Cantonese could purchase rice from Hunan, a few hundred miles distant.

To transport rice overland from Hunan into Kwangtung necessitates the use of carrying coolies. The average human beast of burden will carry 125 pounds 15 miles a day for 40 cents Chinese currency (United States $0.14) or the equivalent of about United States $0.15 per ton per mile. The average rate for freight on American railways is $0.011 per ton per mile.

Overland transportation in China, where railways are not available, thus averages about 12 times as much as does railway transportation in the United States. The people of Canton can better afford to purchase their rice in California and pay the trans-Pacific freight charges than take it from their northern neighbor, Hunan, and pay coolie-carrying

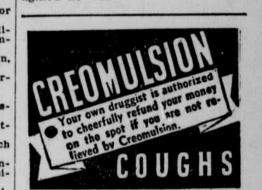

The flour mills of Hankow and Shanghai find it more economical to buy wheat from places as far distant as the United States, Canada, Australia and Argentina than to tap supplies in their own country removed from rail or water transportation.
