

Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Carter Of This City Have Been Married Sixty-two Years

Once again Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Carter, parents of Dr. L. A. Carter, have quietly celebrated an anniversary of their wedding day. The event was observed at the home of the couple in southwest O'Neill. On December 12, 1873, the Carters were married at Glenwood, Iowa, and their immigrating into Kansas to homestead and following events encompass enough adventure to cram a large book with much interesting reading.

In the first place the couple located near Beloit, Kans., Mitchell county, in 1873, and the scene that greeted their eyes must have been little different thousands of years ago. There was prairie on every side, raw land everywhere, few people and money about as scarce as hen's teeth. But the young couple searched for work and a chance to fashion a home and they realized their mission in Kansas was not in the nature of a vacation.

After filing on a homestead, Mr. Carter asked his bride if she was willing to live temporarily in a home scooped out of the side of a hill, in a "dugout," and she replied with a clean-cut "no" that left no doubt about the matter. Mr. Carter had a frame residence in mind but he wanted time to do the building. He hurried his work and soon had his bride busily engaged in one of the largest and most attractive frame residences in Mitchell county.

When hard times are mentioned within hearing of the Carters they smile. Times like the present must seem to them like prosperity bedecked in a castle of gold. Asked about any depression they may have experienced, Mrs. Carter said: "Hard times are a new story to many and the present experience unique to many others, but to us it seems like normal times when we compare it with what we had to go through down there in Kansas.

"While we were desperately trying to get started there in Kansas along came the great panic of 1873. Practically everyone lived solely on corn meal. People had no money to buy anything else. We had a neighbors who used his head trying to evolve some scheme for producing some other food to vary his monotonous corn meal fare and he finally rigged up a contrivance that caught great numbers of snow birds. These he fried or baked and he told people he swore off eating corn meal and ate straight snow bird because he had no money to buy the meal with and was forced to hold expense down to zero. This fellow emerged in the spring nice and healthy, actually a tribute to his ingenuity.

"When times there were at the worst, I decided, after long considering the matter, to bring a ten cent piece I kept as a memento. To part with that dime was like parting with some favorite dog or horse. But I made up my mind to let it go and while in town I went to get mail and there I received a letter from my father in Iowa and when I opened it there was an unexpected check to me for $100. Only those who have been in similar circumstances can appreciate the sheer joy I enjoyed as I started on a round of pricing and shopping."

Two things they feared in Kansas were rattlesnakes and savages, and prairie fires too, were formidable but easily could be guarded against—especially by a young husband bent on protecting his bride at any cost of time or labor.

Mrs. Carter also told of thousands of head of cattle being herded to Kansas to feed on rich and rank buffalo grass, from Texas over the famous old Chisholm trail, and of an exceedingly heavy fall of snow which half melted and froze, encasing the cattle by thousands, freezing and smothering them to death. The prairie was transformed from a blank plain to a scene dotted with white mounds, snow-covered beaves lying in death. Hundreds of rich cattlemen were rendered bankrupt, she says, by the storm. Skimmers worked hard but always were far behind with removing the hides of the fallen cattle.

The Carters, married 62 years, experienced more in their lives than does the average person and apparently they have enjoyed every moment they have lived.

Mr. Carter broke many acres of Kansas prairie, using the then common "breaking plow" and drawing $3 an acre for his labor. One day Mr. Carter stopped at a place and asked if there was prairie sod breaking to be done. "I, too, am searching for that kind of work," the farmer said, "and if I do not find it I do not know what I shall do. I am now eating the last morsels of flour and baked prairie chicken there are for miles around here."

Cracks an inch wide in the man's house sort of corroborated what his tongue declared. In traveling one time Mr. Carter had to pull his wife from a wagon, shake her, then hold her on his arm until he got her to running so to start her blood circulating and thus save her from intense cold that had gripped all Kansas.

One time down there while all the whites in a neighborhood were in town, a white girl of tender years was sort of "shooed" out of the grass, perhaps she had been day-herding cattle, and she ran to a homesteader's residence where the family dog promptly bit out half a pound of flesh from one of her nimble legs. But she kept on sailing until she had entered the house and the Indians failed to get past the dog—and the girl could not leave the house until the white family returned from town.

That was early Kansas; always a "picture show" on the plains to entertain hardy souls who "stuck it out" and just took things as they came.

It must have been about the time that corn meal and prairie chickens were running low when William Noah, brother-in-law to Mr. Carter, opened up in favor of the populists, members of a political party that just suited many of those in the mid-west of the time.

Mr. Noah spoke wherever he could gather an audience. Of his efforts, Mr. Carter had this to say:

"My brother-in-law, Noah, actually spoke all over the country and, although we felt certain he eventually would be shot, poisoned, quartered or burned at the stake for what he said about the monied people of the land, he astonished us by returning alive."

After the Carters had battled Kansas with its hot and cold winds, it's give and take, but mostly take at that time, they packed up and moved back to the state of Iowa and lived there 18 years.

Another move was made, this time to Washington county, Kansas. Finally came the day when the Carters sold out there and moved to Pawnee county, Nebraska. The last time, they lived 18 years in Kansas.

One of the most remarkable observations made by this couple on the vagaries of life is that of all the couples that were married in and around Glenwood, Iowa, at about the time they were united, say within a few months or years, only two couples, as far as is known, are alive today, and these are Mr. and Mrs. Nelson DeLashmutter, of Whiting, Iowa, and Mr. and Mrs. Paul Haney, of Glenwood, Iowa.

The couple are parents of 10 children, three of them having died. The great 2,000 acre cattle ranch of the Carters, situated 12 miles southwest of Chambers, in Holt county, was built up by this remarkable couple. One day they decided this place should be divided equally among their children, and this was done and the matter of shares and interests settled for all time.

Mr. Carter is about 84 and Mrs. Carter is about 80 years of age. Their health is satisfactory, they take keen interest in everything, and they always are in pleasant disposition.

The Frontier wishes the Carters many more years of happy married life.
