

Over the County

SOUTHWEST BREEZES
By Romaine Saunders

Cap Addison made a business trip to the county seat Tuesday.

George Traver, of Amelia, is away at present on a trip to Colorado.

Ed Kilmurry, of Atkinson, accompanied H. L. James to Gordon one day last week, a thoroughbred cattle sale being the inducement.

The claim of democratic spellbinders that there is to be no additional taxation probably implies they don't know of anything more to stick a tax on to.

The campaign to reduce automobile accidents, begun the first of the year with an appeal from President Roosevelt, and the war launched for the extermination of crows, have produced no visible results.

Raymond Bly had an early morning walk Sunday. He had left his car in Amelia for repairs the day previous, starting to hoof it over with the thought of being overtaken by a car conveying some Sunday worshippers to church, but had got this far without being picked up, a distance of three miles. He may have had better fortune before the remaining five miles were strode thru.

The democratic caucus for Swan was held at Art Doolittle's last Thursday night. Courtesy was shown republicans by placing a few of them on their ticket, though endorsing none of the republican precinct ticket. The list of caucus nominees follows: John Kennedy, clerk; A. C. Watson, treasurer; H. L. James, assessor; Will Crandall, justice of the peace; road overseer district 53, Art Doolittle; district 68, Will Dierks; district 69, Claud Lierman.

"Soak the rich." Does that sound like good American doctrine? Maybe a limited class heavily laden with wealth who keep a hundred or so fancy horses and feed them on oatmeal or the simple-minded dames giving twenty-thousand dollar parties for a dog might be soaked a little harder, but it appears to us no system of government nor partisan program has a call to discriminate against one class in favor of another. Moreover, wealth has been acquired in most instances by wise industry. Such that have come within the scope of my acquaintance have not shirked any responsibility due the government, have been worthwhile neighbors, thoughtful of and helpful to the less fortunate.

There is a certain charm about an autumn night if you chance to be out in the great open spaces far removed from the flash of city lights. There is also a mystery in the gloomy shadows; a sense of loneliness, of helplessness, of dread when enfolded in darkness with not the glimmer of a remote star penetrating thru the night. I remember the horror of passing an abandoned graveyard at night as a young boy. It lay on the route home and the few remaining graves held a nameless terror in those slanting slabs of weather-stained marble. It was a period just emerging from ghosts and goblins and elfin fairies. Those grave stones stood ghost-like in the terrifying shadows of oak and maple; weird sounds of creatures of the night in the treetops above the sepulchers of the dead—a combination all that just about scared the daylight out of kids who had to pass that way at night. Boys in my neighborhood got to "ganging up" on these horrors and would all go home together. But I had in mind at the beginning of this paragraph the fascination of a clear October morning down here in the southwest—one of those occasional periods of a rare atmosphere just after sunrise when you can see from Dakota to Kansas. The freshness of a new day, mental and physical vigor renewed after a night's repose, beauty and inspiring grandeur in distant landscape and gorgeously tinted treetops. Something in it all invites us to turn our face and our faith up to the Infinite and gives us a little better start for a hard day ahead.
