Martha's Plain Face

THEY were ready at last. Glenna Downing gave a final dab at her cheeks and smiled into her mirror, satisfied. Glenna was adorable. Everyone conceded it. Martha Dennis watched her soberly. Martha did not smile into her own mirror. She was not adorable and everyone knew that—or she thought they did. She was plain even to her name, and when you are young and plain—well, nothing much comes your way, at least not the things that youth most wants.

Today the two girls were leaving the hot, hurrying office for a whole month's vacation in the cool, green country. "A good time to forget my grievance," Martha said to herself sturdily, "and perhaps, just perhaps, the folks there will like plain faces."

At last the journey ended. The two girls arrived in the little town of Bannerly, and with the arrival came at once to Martha the overthrow of all her castles. When she looked into the steady, shining eyes of Herman Morris she knew that to stand aside for Glenna would cost more than she had ever paid before. Ordinarily, she could look on at Glenna's love affairs unmoved, save for the inevitable sense of defeat and loneliness, but not this time!

At his mother's bountiful spread supper table, Herman greeted the "summer boarders" heartily. Martha watched him as he gallantly assisted old Mrs. Brodwell to her place and dexterously seated her in her chair. When the introductions to herself and Glenna came, she felt him sweep her with a quick, unseeing glance, while Glenna caught and held him as was her wont with men.

After that, as the time sped by, it seemed to Martha that he came from business a bit earlier each day, always ready for some pastime with the two girls. At first she went along with a sort of desperate determination. She would make him notice her—and he did. With his accustomed courtesy he saw to it that she was properly escorted.

"But I know the difference between politeness and devotion," Martha said to herself, brokenly.

Then, finally, with an heroic resolve: "I'll leave them to their own happiness." So the next afternoon she pleaded illness and watched them hurry away, teasing and bantering each other. "And so pleased I'm sick," thought Martha. She did not catch the queer, indefinable look on Herman's face. Glenna did not see it, either.

The dreary afternoon to which Martha had condemned herself was abruptly interrupted. Sadie, the maid, in deep despair, came calling for Mr. Morris. His mother had gone to her room too ill to talk and what should she do about supper? The cooking had never been delegated to anyone. Martha's eyes gleamed. She might be unattractive but she was not helpless!

"Tell Mrs. Morris not to worry. I will manage supper." And she did. "The nicest biscuits Mrs. Morris ever made," unanimously agreed the boarders, "and the very best croquettes."

Martha did not know of the conference between mother and son in Mrs. Morris' room that evening, nor did she see a certain peculiar expression rest again on Herman's face.

Several times during the next few days, when she could escape Glenna, she slipped away into the kitchen to lend a helping hand, though the mistress was again in charge.

"The finest little lady I know," Mrs. Morris confided to her son, and failed to note the acquiescence in his eyes.

Then Herman decided to appeal to Glenna. She was a good pal and would not fail him. So he began one afternoon on the lake, when Martha had again declined to accompany them. "There's something of great importance to me, Glenna, that I want to ask you."

Glenna's heart turned completely over once and she knew she was going to say "yes" much more promptly than she had ever intended to say it to any man. Then he went on and she heard as though from a great distance: "If Miss Dennis has not taken an incurable dislike to me, I wish you'd help me find the way to her heart."

Glenna gave one quick look into his troubled eyes, swallowed hard and thought fast. After a considerable pause, "I think I know the route," she answered steadily. To herself she said, "People who don't happen to be handsome shall have no monopoly on sacrifice. I'll show them."

The next afternoon she waved a smiling good-by to the two from her seat on the veranda. When they had gone a little distance the smile vanished and she watched them with tight-closed lips until they were beyond sight.

"I'm glad. I will be glad!" she breathed. "Martha needs him and I—well, I can't have him, that's all."

Some time later, Martha, still half afraid, said shyly, "Are you sure you don't mind that I'm homesely, Herman?"

"Homesely? Are you?" and he laughed. "I didn't know—I didn't notice. I just saw YOU."
