(1) A Marine infantry outfit moved cautiously along a trail on the afternoon of D-Day in the invasion of Peleliu. A fresh-faced, 20-year-old bazooka man, Private First Class Robert Bungard of Diamond, O., slipped forward with his buddies. His eyes searched the trail for signs of the enemy. He was in action for the first time and his throat was dry. (2) Suddenly, a fleet of Jap tanks topped the crest of a hill and lumbered down toward the Marines. Bungard dived into a shell hole and waited for the Japs to come within range. He opened fire with his rocket launcher when the first Jap tanks were within 200 yeards. His first shot damaged one of the leading pair of tanks. His second tank fleet, estimated to have numbered 20 in all, sought to spread out over the ridge, the young bazooka man aimed again. Three hits were enough to disable another tank. Other Marines of his outfit, who had been doing their best to dig in when the tanks appeared, cheered and picked off the Jap tank crews as they scrambled out of their blazing armor. (4) Bungard turned his attention to a fourth Jap tank. He knocked this one out with two well-placed rockets. The Marines yelled like a football crowd. The rest of the Jap tanks fled back over the ridge. (5) Bungard's buddies took stock when the tanks disappeared. They found that the young Leatherneck had blasted four Jap tanks into blackened wrecks with only eight shots from his bazooka. The whole action lasted only 10 furious minutes but it earned for Bungard the name of "The Bazooka Kid."
