A SUMMER REQUIEM.

Spirit of Summer! thou whose honeyed sweets Ne'er fail fulfillment of their promise fair; Thou at whose smile Earth's odorous voices To fill with balmy breath the gladdened air; Where are thy songs, thy meiodies, thy lays, That cheered our weary hearts and soothed our pains

Silent thy music now, thy songsters fled, And nothing but their memories remain; Faded thy blossoms, all thy buds decayed, While hollow winds moan sadly through thy

Yet though thy smiling gardens bloom no We'll not forget the perfume of thy flowers. Come are thy cloudless days; thy happy skies Are dim and tearful now 'neath Winter's Disrobed thy trees, as the last dying leaves. From naked boughs come slowly fluttering down. How sad to wander through thy sodden Gray with a brooding mist, damp with decay, nere Summer's leaves lie rotting at our feet, Or by the chilly blast are borne away.

Now faint the scent of dead and dying plants; Now clings the fungus to the humid stone, And creaks the frog from yonder weedy For all the woodland happiness is gone.

If on the biackened stems some wintry ray Athwart should fall and linger there awhile, Twould be but as the echo of a song, The shadow of a once familiar smile,

As fade the minbow colors in the sky, We do not prize our happiness enough, We scarcely feel it as it passes by,

Though looking always for some joy unknown, o-day must ever incomplete remain, And not till past we know how sweet it was, Sphrit of Summer, visit us again. -Chambers's Journal.

Overhead the poplar leaves stirred and rustled to each other, though all the other trees were still. Something was going on in the air that none but they knew about. None, unless it might be Phoebe Ann. Little enough went on above or below that she didn't know of or at least guess at.
