FRINGED GENTIAN.

Along this wood road winding slow, When free October ranged its sylvan ways, And vanifying up the terraced steep below. Chased laughing sunbeams through the golden days,
In matchless benaty, tender and screne,
The gentian reigned an undispated queen.

One sudden break, half down the lengthening shade, Revealed a dark-rimmed circle, still and Her presence filled that spn-illumined glade, She made the enchanted solitude her own; The beavens above their watch eternal kept, And, steeped in light, the embracing wood-land slept.

Pale knots of grasses filled the open space, Her lifted cups passed lightly through and through— Each chalice molded in divinest grace, Each brimmed with pure, intense and per-feet bine; Alone and spotless in her virgin frame, Her life upheld the year's immortal claim. Now wall low winds about the forest eaves, Now life grows cold 'neath cold and dreary

And nestling ankle deep in fallen leaves, The lone, deserted wood path blanching Hes; Yet, pinched and was, of youthful charm be reft. The last forsaken gentian still is left.

A wondrous fairness hath the perfect flower, say: Serenely calm beneath a supplier sky, But holier far, in autumn's wildest bour, The constant love that can not wholly die; To me her radiant youth new faith did bring,

Yet now her pallor seems a higher thing. Thrilled by the gaze, I deem no fancy wild Where spirit grace outlasts the ruder clay; For me the autumn's last and loveliest child

But when cold storms have stripped the snow In finer spirit presence lingers still! -Elaine Goodale,
