PAMELA CRUMP'S ESCAPADE.

The Cramps were, or considered themselves, the very first people in Potts ville, and Josiah Cramp, the present head of the family, was very proud of his ancestors. He was about the meanest man in money matters ever known. He had driven his boys from home by his niegardliness; and now that his wife. was dead his daughter Pamela was all that he had left. She was a bandsome, strong, well-made girl, with a good mind, although he had given her the very poorest education and no accomplishments whatever. She worked in his Horse, house without help, or thanks, or reward. The eards were circulated through that she was Miss Crump.

said Mr. Crump. "Certainly I ought to go to church," said Pamela.

can doesn't need to beg for her clothes." Brushing her tears away, she ran into the entry, took from a peg her shabby sack and hat, put them on, locked up the following: the house, and hurried down the village street as fast as her strong young limbs could carry her, until she stopped at a little white house, at the low window of which she tapped. A little girl opened the door, and Pamela followed her into a sitting-room, where a thin woman sat, amidst cushions, in a big Boston rocking-chair, with a brand new baby across her knee, two older ones on the floor near her, and two little boys building a block-house on the table, while the little girl who had opened the door made the sixth of the youthful group.

"Why, Miss Pamela," said the mother, "how pleased I am to see you! Ex- swered.
