A man who lately held the position of night telegraph operator at one of the stations on a New England railroad has related to a reporter of the New Haven Union a personal experience which serves to illustrate the chances of disaster to which travelers are constantly exposed. He was the only man in the depot at night and his hours were from 7:30 p. m. to 7:30 a. m. One night he dropped asleep at his instrument and the next thing he knew he awoke to train, and his telegraphic call vigorously sounded on the receiver before him. To his dismay he perceived that his right hand and arm were asleep, as the common expression is, and totally useless, and it was only with great difficulty that he could give an intelligible response to the signal with his left hand and scrawl a brief memorandum of the instructions which followed. However he did succeed in stopping the approaching train and giving the impor-tant orders which he had just received. "But," said he to the reporter, "the affair frightened me so that I determined never to nap any more in that office, and to get off the road just as soon as I could find a decent place else-
