FROG FARMING.
The Profits and Losses Attending the Industry.
"What do I think of the establishment of frog farms in the United States to supply the demand in Europe? It is a fine idea in theory only," remarked a state fish commissioner to a representative of the Mail and Express.
"Why do you say in theory only?"
"Because it has already been tried. Experiments in frog farming have proved futile, and the man who attempts it gets some experience and no recompense for his trouble. Several frog farms have been started, always with the same result. The reason they do not succeed is this: it is very difficult to provide proper and sufficient food for them during their infantile period. The birds eat the tadpoles and the adult frogs live upon insects, leaving their watery, swampy habitation and skimming around on the land for them. In a farm they can not well forage for insects, there are so many confined to a limited area. It is utterly impossible to catch enough insects to satisfy and furnish the frog farm. They prey upon each other. The baby frog is greedily devoured by the large bull-frog, who floats along in a stagnant pool with its mouth open, snapping them up with avidity. It is a survival of the fittest. The fittest in this case are not expected to pay for those that perished. The embryo jelly that floats along covered with green ooze from weeds, from which a million frogs may germinate in the war of the hungry and strong over the weak does not escape. A farm started several seasons ago near California, in Livingston county, this state, proved an egregious failure, and dead expense for the reasons I have mentioned. If it could be done successfully there would be millions in it. It is a Utopian dream, the fulfillment of which, I think, will be many years from the present."
"Are many frogs consumed daily in New York?"
"Yes. During the summer months from one thousand to two thousand pounds are eaten daily. They are shipped fresh to this market from Canada principally, in large half barrels. The love for frog meat is on the increase. Epicures and men of extreme wealth give exorbitant prices for them. The large green bullfrog is the chief kind sold in this market. In Chicago they are called water chickens, because their flesh is white as that of a chicken when dressed properly."
The import and export partner of a large wholesale grocery establishment said that no canned frogs were exported to Europe. "The fact is, there are no canned frogs for sale worth mentioning. In the eastern part of the British provinces and Canada a few were put up in cans. It did not pay and they stopped. Then a little while ago the industry was started on Prince Edward's Island but the facility for shipping live frogs killed it, and to-day canned frogs are a rarity. Thousands upon thousands of frogs are shipped to Europe each summer and fall, alive. They are placed in large barrels, between layers of damp moss and leaves. When they arrive at their destination they are healthy and sound and free from fever. The stock of frogs in Europe is limited. I lived in France twenty-seven years, and never tasted one during that period. Although the French are called a nation of frog-eaters, yet they do not consume one-tenth as many as the people of the United States. The frogs there are few in size of a very inferior size, the largest not being two and a half inches long. They are stunted in growth, and do not seem to multiply as fast as here. It has long been the dream of certain French enterprisers of renown to introduce the American green bullfrog into France for the purpose of propagation. The old stock of dwarfs, they argue, would soon fall victims to the vigorous American breed, and disappear. They have no frog farms in France, even of those dwarfed specimens. I do not suppose to-day if an offer of $100 was made in Paris for a can of frogs that one could be found there. About fifty cans of snails are imported to America yearly from France. Terrapin, too, is rarely ever canned. If frog farms can be established and furnish the means to do a large business, my impression is it would spread, and in the course of ten years from now frog farms would be quite numerous. There are men who, will try the experiment next summer, and raise frogs for the educated palates of Parisians and New Yorkers. If they succeed, they will grow immensely wealthy."—New York Mail and Express.
