FRIDAY, MAY 15, 1885.
AN ANECDOTE OF GRANT.

The Chilling Reception He Gave a Delegation from South Carolina.

The assertion that Gen. Grant has never been a profane man, so many of our generals were, has recently been illustrated by anecdotes showing that he refrained from swearing under very trying circumstances. I never heard the general swear, says a writer in the Washington Capital, but I certainly saw him mad enough to make things blue if he had broken out.

In the spring of 1874 a delegation came here from a taxpayers' convention in South Carolina to expostulate against the intolerable extravagance, folly, and fraud of their state government. Frank Moses, the young native governor, as he had been dubbed by those who thought carpet-baggers the sum of all evil, who had shown them that the finger of Moses was heavier than the loins of Scott, was wearing the close of his term. To prepare for a desperate effort to redeem the state, a non-partisan taxpayers' convention was called, and the result was "an appeal to Caesar."

A delegation of twenty of the most distinguished men of the state came here; Gen. James Chestnut, who died recently, was at its head. I went with them, by appointment, to the white house to present the bill of grievances. As we were passing up the stairway to the president's reception room Senator John J. Patterson, the carpet-bag representative of the Palmetto state, passed down. He had a grin on his somewhat sardonic face, which was indicative of disaster to those he grinned at.

Gen. M. C. Butler, now senator, certainly construed it as a danger signal. For he said to me: "Now, I wonder what Patterson has been up to?" The delegation was not long in finding out. When they filed into the reception-room Grant was standing to receive them, one clinched hand resting on the table, an angry flush upon his face, and an expression of the eye fitter for the battlefield than for the reception-room. He went through the ceremony of introduction coldly, and then said: "What can I do for you?" W. D. Porter, Charleston's most famous lawyer, presented the resolutions of the convention and the protest of the taxpayers of South Carolina against the continued existence of the state government. Mr. Lathers unfolded the long proof-sheet of an individual protest, which he would have proceeded to read had not Grant, with an impatient gesture, interrupted him. "Gentlemen," said he, "that all you have to say concerning the present government of South Carolina is true. I do not admit or deny. The administration of affairs in that state is in the hands of those who were dragged by large majority of the people to represent them; you must find your remedy at the ballot-box; but even if I had it in my power to prevent the evils of which you complain I do not think I am bound to do so. Why should I help those who shamefully abuse me? The convention which sent you here, even dragged the name of my wife into its debates and made her the subject of false and scandalous accusations."

The delegation was dumfounded. The members had not expected any very warm sympathy, but this turning of the tables was too sudden to find them prepared. Those who had noticed the exit of " Honest John Patterson" were, however, not so much surprised at Grant's familiarity with the proceedings of the convention. The sly politician had primed Grant for the reception, and on the table close to Grant's hands was a newspaper clipping—the report of Gen. Grant's speech in the convention.

Gen. Gary, as chairman of the committee on federal relations, had opposed an appeal to Grant. He denounced him as a drunken tyrant, not a whit better than his fellow-radicals in South Carolina. "While Moses and his fellow-thieves," said he, "are robbing the people of South Carolina, Grant and his fellow-thieves are robbing the whole people of the United States. While negro harlots are peddling legislative pay certificates in the streets of Columbia, the wife of Grant is selling the secrets of the treasury to the gamblers of Wall street."

So the taxpayers' delegation went away sorrowful. If Grant had been calm enough to listen to explanation, they would have learned that Gen. Grant's report and speech had been made and rebuked by the convention, which referred the report back to his committee and adopted an address temperate, patriotic and conservative in its tone.

The following account is given of the origin of the term "evening dress" the revival of Masaryk, in 1772, the loss punishment was inflicted on the man who listened at the door of a "sonic meeting in order to hear the secrets. He was summarily committed to prison. He was placed under the arrest of his house while it was raining and the water ran in under the eaves and out at his shoes." "The man" was inflicted on the spot, and has continued every since.

The lumber supply of the west and north-west is being cut off by the railroad to be built from Manitoba, only timber will, it is estimated, the amount of lumber will enable such a building of them as will enable such a great white pine operation to the first of the west and north-west.
