YOU CAN NOT RUB IT OUT.

In the old Scottish inn we met, A motley group from every land, Scholar and artist, peer and priest, And many a traveler brown and tauned, All pdgrims waiting for an hour, Chatting in die courtesy, And yet amid the drifting talk A fittle message came to me.

It has pened thus: A resiless boy Unto the dr.pping window went, Whose glass, scarred with a thousand names, His mind to the same fancy bent. He sought and found a vacant spot. And took the diamond from his hand, But ere a letter had been formed A voice accustomed to command

Cried: "Philip, stop: before you write, Consider well what you re about. "Father, why should I hesitate?" "Because you can not rub it out." The words fell on my idle ear, I sad them oer and oer again, And a-ked myself: Oh, who would choose All they have written to remain?

Unto a loving mother oft We all have sent, without a doubt, Full many a hard and careless word That now we never can rub out; For cruel words cut deeper far Then diamond on the window-pane And off-recalled in after years They would her o'er and o'er again

So in our daily work and life We write and do and say the thing We never can undo nor stay With any future sorrowing. We carve ourselves on beating hearts, Ah, then, how wise to pause and doubt, To blend with love and thought our words, Because we can not rub them out! -Harper's Weekly
