

An American Farmer.
John Anderson, of Anderson Station, Tenn., says a writer in the New Orleans Times-Democrat, when he began life, purchased ten acres of ground on credit at the foot of the Cumberland mountain, on Crow creek. While he was clearing his wife made maple sugar, which he carried to Cedar Bluff on the Tennessee river, and exchanged for a piece of iron made at Carter's iron works. He carried it to a shop near Winchester and worked two days as a striker to get it made into a "horse-shoe". He used the shovels for traces and was soon turning the soil. He is now a very wealthy man, and owns 25,000 acres of land. He kills 150 hogs annually for his own use, and has not a lock of hair on his head and outhouses. An intelligent daughter—one of his twenty-one children—said to a correspondent: "It is no use to look here, when anybody can have what they want for the asking." He employs a teacher by the year, and "anybody can send who wants to."
