Bishop Dudley on the Negro Question.

Bishop Dudley, of Kentucky, has a paper in the June Century, entitled "How Shall We Help the Negro?" We quote the following: "Still the problem remains, how shall these alien races dwell in safety side by side, each free and unhampered in the enjoyment of life and liberty and in the pursuit of his happiness? They are the descendants of one father, the redeemed children of one God, the citizens of one nation, neighbors with common interests, and yet are separated by the results of centuries of development, physical, mental, and moral,—separated by inherited traditions, by the spirit of caste, by the recollection of wrongs done and suffered, though it may be in general as innocent in the perpetrator as in the sufferer. How shall the rights of all be duly guarded? How shall the lower race be lifted up to higher stages of human development, for only so can the rights of the superior race be made secure for the present and for the future, and this is the chiefest right of them who are now cast down?"

"I answer, by the personal endeavors of individuals of the higher race; by their personal contact with those, their ignorant and untaught neighbors, exhibiting before their wondering eyes in daily life the principles of truth and justice, purity and charity, honesty and courage. Perhaps this may seem to be the veriest platitudes, the gush of sentiment, the twaddle of a madman's dream, but in all truth and soberness I mean exactly what I say. Let me try to explain more fully.

"These people need help, that they may be lifted up. I mean, then, that in my judgment the help must be personal and not official, the hand of a friend rather than the club of an officer, the patient counsel of a neighbor rather than the decree of a court, the enactment of a Congress, or the proclamation of a President. The solemn sanctions of the organic law are thrown round about this liberty, and the robe of citizenship, full, perfect, and complete, with never seen nor met, has been put upon it. The courts have declared its inviolable character, and this decree affirms the negro, the branded slave, a citizen. But does the declaration make him such? I mean does it, can it impart the intelligence, the moral consciousness which shall vivify the dead mass and make it a helpful member of the body politic? We have had declarations from every department of the Government that the negro is a citizen; but they are as powerless to effect their purpose as were the oft-repeated acts of the Confederate Congress to make the paper dollar worth more than two cents; as nugatory and vain as the old-time legislation of Virginia that there should be a citizen, and such a designated cross-road. The negro is a citizen, and he has the rights under the Constitution and the laws that any white man has; and yet he needs help, though it may be the black man who demands it, would dilate him to think so,—he needs help, personal, individual, patient, loving help, that he may be fitted to exercise his covenant rights, and to do the duties which these rights impose."

Sam Jones' Story.

As told at the Methodist church Friday night it is as follows: "There was a married couple with half a dozen children and only one bed. The whole family put on that bed and were so thick that one couldn't get under and all did. So when anyone got tired sleeping on one side he'd say, 'turn'—and over the whole family went. They got so used to it that even when they heard the word 'turn' in their sleep they would tumble over. One day the old man was fishing on a log bridge over the river. The sun was hot and the fish wa'n't biting, and he fell asleep balanced on the log. One of the boys saw him and thought he would try a joke, and hallooed out 'Turn!' Over the old man went head first into the water. Now I want to temperance men to halloo 'Turn!' at the anti-men who are asleep on the bridge over the prohibition river will hear it and drop in."—Atlanta Constitution.

The soap craze has broken out among fashionable ladies of Albany, N. Y. As soon as they saw a new style they either buy it or else an old lady for it. Many of these make designs of their own. The prevailing style is to have a large jar mounted on a brass or bronze pedestal, resembling something artistic. The lamp is in this jar or vase, which is usually of a chocolate color. The shade is made of splashed ware, is glass, of course, and looks as if some liquid gold or other material had splashed over it.

A watchmaker in Newcastle, England, has made a set of three gold shirt studs, in one of which is a watch and keeps correct time. The three studs are connected by a strip of silver inside the shirt holes, and the watch in the middle is wound up by turning the stud above, and the hands are set by turning the stud below.

The Court of Appeals, of Connecticut, has decided that railroad passes (except cases of charity), are given to the recipients in expectation of reciprocal labor, or in return for favors already rendered, and that they are contracts, and not gifts.

"My husband is so justice," said one lady to another in a Seventh street car the other day. "Have you ever tried rubbin' his joints with hartshorn liniment, mam?" interrupted a beefy-looking woman with a market basket at her feet, who was sitting at her elbow and overheard the remark. "That'll straighten him out as quick as anything I know of, if he hasn't got it too bad."—Washington Republic.

Citizen to country editor—"A pleasant little affair occurred last night at my home, which terminated in the marriage of my daughter. Would you like the particulars?" Country editor—"Where, I might make a short mention of the matter, but we are badly cramped for space." A little later: Another citizen—"My wife ran away last night with another man. Do you want the particulars?" Country editor, eagerly—"Yes; yes; give me the whole business."

A man who used to preach the Gospel in the settlements has written to a friend in Boston, Mass., that he is running a bar in Uleka, Mont., and that his partner is Vaughn, an old-timer from California, who used to deal fare for Big-Mouth Liza in Colorado, and was sent to the penitentiary for burglary. "He is a good gambling man," declares his ex-colonial partner, "a burst of admiration and adulation, by way of special vindication: 'Selling whiskey pays better than preaching, and, besides, it is so hard work.'"

Carlyle's Literary Belatedness

Professor Mason speculates very suggestively over this phenomenon, calling attention to a profound change that gradually came over Carlyle's work, in which he passes from the superficial phase of literature about literature to the graver and deeper problems of human society and human action, and in which the mere literature is merged in the more serious philosophy.

"The causes of this belatedness of Carlyle's literary life, to use an expression of Milton's, were various. There had, certainly, been no original defect or sluggishness of genius. The young Carlyle who had just completed his classes in Edinburgh University, the young Carlyle struggling at schoolmastering in Kirkcaldy, the young Carlyle of the next few years again walking in the streets of Edinburgh and living by private tutoring and hack-writing, was essentially the same Carlyle who became famous afterward—the same in his earnestness, the same in moral magnanimity and integrity, the same in intellectual strength of grasp. One is astonished now by the uniformity of the testimonies of his intimates of those early days to his literary and other powers, the boundlessness of the terms in which they predicted his future distinction. His own early letters are also in the evidence. They are wonderful letters to have been written in the late teens and early twenties of a Scottish student's life, and point him as even then a tremendous kind of person. As respects Carlyle's 'belatedness,' then, may not the fact that his elements were such that the earnestness of his nature would not cease to count for something? It would seem as if that peculiar kind of poetic genius which tends to verse as its proper form of expression can always attain to mastery in that form with less of delay and discipline than is required for mastery in prose, and, at all events, the traditions of literature are such that the appearance of a new genius in verse is always more quickly hailed by the public than anything corresponding in prose."—Popular Science Monthly.

Bears in Wisconsin.

I have read some of your bear stories with a good deal of interest, writes a Wisconsin correspondent of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, and I want to tell you of one that has a large measure of truth, I imagine, as those you have published. There lives in this country, and in the vicinity of this place, a Norwegian family that had an odd experience with bears. The oldest man discovered that his corn was being destroyed, and, arming himself and his two boys with muskets and a navy revolver, they went to watch for the bears, or whatever might be eating the corn. Each one climbed a tree and made ready for business. The bears came. The old bear went under the old man, and the old man had climbed. He thought he would not shoot, but throw a limb at bruin, and the bear went under the tree where one of the boys was. This frightened the boy so that he fell out on the bear. This scared the bear as bad as the boy, and he ran away. The old man saw the bear climb the tree and ran away. As they struck the ground one of the muskets exploded, and created a general panic. This ended the first chapter.

The next day, as they were at work in the potato patch, the bears came to the corn again. They shot dead, and they heard a woman scream, and they ran toward the house, and the boys found their mother beating the bear into the hog-pen. When they came up the bear jumped out and ran away, and the family retired to their dwelling to get rid of the bears.—Boston Herald.

Napoleon III. and Mlle. de Montijo.

The gossip since the fall of the Empire says that the Emperor's declaration was brought on by a somewhat comical incident. They relate that returning from the chase one evening with Mlle. de Montijo, the Emperor ventured to introduce himself at the door of her private room and to linger there for a moment; thereupon he was rebuffed, and they ran toward the house, and the boys found their mother beating the bear into the hog-pen. When they came up the bear jumped out and ran away, and the family retired to their dwelling to get rid of the bears.—Boston Herald.

There was a great outpouring of scandal as soon as this announcement was made. The elder Countess of Montijo had the dissatisfaction of seeing her past reviewed without mercy, and the Legation and other factions of the Monarchical Opposition to the new Emperor gave full vent to their spleen and their spite. The Prince Napoleon was naturally very angry, as it put an end to the hope that he had been chosen as chief of the legitimate successor of Napoleon III. Everywhere the coming marriage was alluded to as eccentric; and so wise and careful a man as M. Thiers even ventured to have his little joke at the Emperor's expense. He said: "The Emperor has always seemed to me to be a clever man. Today I see that he has plenty of foresight, for by his marriage he is probably reserving for himself the rank of a Spanish grandee."

This little piece of country contained a delicate allusion to the insecurity of the Emperor's position.

"Have you ever tried rubbin' his joints with hartshorn liniment, mam?" interrupted a beefy-looking woman with a market basket at her feet, who was sitting at her elbow and overheard the remark.
