news of the day from the Old Dominion, and just as Mr. Stewart was enjoying a hearty laugh over the incident whatever it was, I found myself standing at the window among the house plants and near the cage of Dick's famous bird, when my conversation with Mary turned upon the business of reporting for a newspaper.

Then we drifted off upon the various topics of the times, until we touched upon the question of the rebellion. Knowing, as I did, the sentiments of the father, I tried to evade a further discussion of the subject with the daughter. But, to my surprise, Mary produced her scrap book, which she had brought from home at the time of her father's flight, and handing it to me said: "Read on page 44, and there find my sentiments." I took the book, and turning to page 44, what was my surprise in finding the article which I had written for the Press, out of which had grown all the severe trials of my life?

I perused the article, mechanically only; for there came a mighty tumult of feelings into my mind, such as I had never before experienced.

The room seemed filled with a mellow, subdued light, while the voices of Mr. Stewart and Dick seemed to die away in the distance. I closed the book, handed it to the owner, and then gently changed the conversation to other topics, not without having first tried to thank the noble girl for her good opinion of my article on so grave a subject as that of the reconstruction of the south.

As we left the Hon. Mr. Stewart and his accomplished daughter that evening, and at the moment of bowing ourselves out of their presence, and as Mary stood with one fair hand upon the door knob, our eyes met as they had never met before, and then and there was revealed to me why it was that my dear old home in the south and my then present abode in the land of ice and sleet and snow had become so blended and mixed up in the great drama in which I had become one of the characters.

And now as I am writing at this far off time, and in this far off place, how happy I am for the revelation of that old country's night.

NOTE.

This story, Mr. Willoughby informs us, will close at about chapter XVIII, and sometime in next month. From the many letters which we have received from our readers, wanting to know the author's real name, and enquiring after missing numbers of the paper, we are led to conclude that this serial has been more than ordinarily well received and appreciated by the public.

We hope to make arrangements with the author for another story to begin in January next, and to run through about 25 numbers of the paper. There seems to be an originality about Mr. Willoughby that strikes a popular chord, and insures his productions a warm reception.

What's in a Name? is, of course, partly fiction and partly the real experience of the author. We think that men and women and boys and girls who have read the 15 chapters of this story have been made happier, more humane, and are, therefore, the recipients of much good.

Just what the title of the proposed new story will be, we do not now feel warranted in stating; but that the story will be well written and full of interest to our readers, we feel warranted in offering them the fullest assurance. Let each of our patrons provide a scrap book and keep all of these chapters for future reference.
