CHANGING CLIMATES. Of course climates change: some suddenly, other so imperceptibly that the changes are not noted in the memory of the human race. A change in elimate so gradual as to require ten thousand years would be imperceptible to the human mind, and the race would accommodate itself to the new environments so gradually as not to note the constant change to a colder or warmer, wetter or drier climate.

A stupendous change in the climate of the Rocky mountain country has occurred, probably within ten thoushibited in Machinery Hall. This and years past. New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah. In northern Siberia remains of tropical animals are found frozen in the ice where they must have remained many thousands of years in that condition. Their carcasses when thawed furnished food for wild animals.

Mammoths of a now extinct species are found there so well preserved that they are restored to life-like forms and exhibited in the museums. A remarkable fact about these animal rcmains is that they are found with tropical plants, vegetables and fruits in their stomachs and in their mouths, proving that they were in a hot countra and that the climate suddenly changed to that of arctic winter.

Learned writers have been greatly puzzled to account for theselfac s and the only theory that will explain them is that the earth's equator suddenly
