Suffice it to say, that the victims swarmed about the house, anxiously inquiring for the "Great European Wizard," and each sighing over the loss of their money, taken from them by this bold confidence woman. Among the motley crowd were noticed a colored woman and her daughter, who had paid Madame Mitchell $25 to have her cure some disease which afflicted the daughter, The disease was worse than ever, and they both wanted back their money. Another vic-im, a white woman, was lamenting the loss of $10; a young man who had contributed fifteen dollars to this huge fraud, wore a woebegone expression on his countenance. Others, among whom were some very respectable appearing people, came to the house, and made anxious inquiries for the "Great European Wizard," and when they learned that she had gone, they discreetly concealed their vexation, and returned home sadder, wiser and poor-
