APPLETON'S

American CYCLOPAÆDIA

New Revised Edition.

Entirely rewritten by the ablest writers on every subject. Printed from new type, and illustrated with Several Thousand Engravings and Maps.

THE work originally published under the title of THE NEW AMERICAN CYCLOPÆDIA was completed in 1863, since which time the wide circulation which it has attained in all parts of the United States, and the signal developments which have taken place in every branch of science, literature, and art, have induced the editors and publishers to submit it to an exact and thorough revision, and to issue a new edition entitled, THE AMERICAN CYCLOPÆDIA.

Within the last ten years the progress of discovery in every department of knowledge has made a new work of reference an imperative want.

The movement of political affairs has kept pace with the discoveries of science, and their fruitful application to the industrial and useful arts and the conveniences and refinement of social life. Great wars and consequent revolutions have occurred, involving national changes of peculiar moment. The civil war of our own country, which was at its height when the last volume of the old work appeared, has happily been ended, and a new course of commercial and industrial activity has been commenced.

Large accessions to our geographical knowledge have been made by the indefatigable explorers of Africa.

The great political revolutions of the last decade, with the natural result of the lapse of time, have brought into public view a multitude of new men, whose names are in every one's mouth, and of whose lives every one is curious to know the particulars. Great battles have been fought and important sieges maintained, of which the details are as yet preserved only in the newspapers or in the transient publications of the day, but which ought now to take their place in permanent and authentic history.

In preparing the present edition for the press, it has accordingly been the aim of the editors to bring down the information to the latest possible dates, and to furnish an accurate account of the most recent discoveries in science, of every fresh production in literature, and of the newest invention in the practical arts, as well as to give a succinct and original record of the progress of political and historial event.

The work has been begun after long and careful preliminary labor, and with the most ample resources for carrying it on to a successful termination.

None of the original stereotype plates have been used, but every page has been printed on new type, forming in fact a new Cyclopædia, with the same plan and compass as its predecessor, but with a far greater pecuniary expenditure, and with such improvements in its composition as have been suggested by longer experience and enlarged knowledge.

The illustrations which are introduced for the first time in the present edition have been added not for the sake of pictorial effect, but to give greater lucidity and force to the explanations in the text. They embrace all branches of science and natural history, and depict the most unique and remarkable features of scenery, architecture, and art, as well as the various processes of mechanics and manufactures. Although intended for instruction rather than embellishment, no pains have been spared to insure their artistic excellence: the cost of their execution is enormous, and it is believed they will find a welcome reception as an admirable feature of the Cyclopædia, and worthy its high character.

The work is sold to Subscribers only, payable on delivery of each volume. It will be completed in sixteen large octavo volumes, each containing about 800 pages fully illustrated with several thousand Wood Engravings, and with numerous colored Lithographic Maps.

THE BROTHER'S VENGEANCE.

A Romantic Legend of the Early Settlement of Louisville—Ghosts and Goblins, Beauty and Blood.

(From the Louisville Courier)

There is a vacant lot in a part of this city, not a thousand miles from the City Hospital, in which, it is said, disembodied spirits hold high carnival. Terror-stricken servants in the neighborhood aver that mysterious rings, without corresponding movement of the bells, rouse them at the dead of night, the window panes rattle and, the lights burn blue, as there comes a mighty rush though the air without. But these are but the effects—the dread visitants have been seen, even recognized by some bolder than the rest, and this is the frightened story which one of them told an eagle-eared listner, who, in turn, detailed it to a Courier-Journal reporter, and who again gives it to the public, neither enlarged nor diminished from the shape in which it was first received. Every Wednesday night, at the orthodox hour, as the various clocks of the city chime midnight, A BOOTED AND SPURRED HORSEMAN starts up from the bowels of the earth just at the center of the vacant places, haults a moment, and looks around, and then plunges at headlong speed across the space. As he spurs his phantom steed, two other ghostly attendants first put in an appearance, and discovering the one horseman, madly pursue him. The first figure and his horse made for a house looking upon the lot, and pass directly through, followed by the twain behind. The three are then lost to sight; naught but the gradually fainter pat of the horses' hoofs being heard, until the clock strikes the third quarter of the first hour of the morning. Then, by the same avenue, but two of the three return, the pursued being absent, but with the riderless animal accompanying them, led by one of the number. All slowly proceed to the spot where the apparitions first have their birth, and as the hour strikes, the place that knew them but the moment before, at the instant knows them not.

These mysterious circumstances have been so frequently repeated during the last few months, and the neighboring householders have been so often annoyed by these nocturnal visits, that the matter has been thoroughly investigated. Watch was instituted, and the discoveries were as above stated. The reason for these supernatural visitors again returning to earth has been shrouded in mystery, and conjecture was rife to account for the cause. The story came to the ears of a reporter of this paper, and dilligent inquiry satisfied him that there was at least a foundation for the account. An old gentleman living near, who had indeed, been born within call of the spot, was said to know something of the matter, and an interview brings the following tale, perhaps "over true," to light. Credence may be given, or not, to this story, but he seemed worthy of belief.

AN OLD MAN'S TALE.

He says that his father moved to this vicinity when Louisville was but a village, and this part of the neighborhood presented only an occasional clearing in a wilderness of forest. Just where these disturbances are said to have taken place the best house in all the country round about had been built by a man who had come to Louisville from Virginia, he believed, but of whose antecedents nothing was definitely known. He seemed, however, to have plenty of money and made this house larger and more commodious than any of its neighbors. After having lived in it alone for some time, he suddenly left the place, and was absent for several months, leaving the house in charge of two servants. He returned at the expiration of this period, bringing with him a lovely woman, and represented her, as was the case without doubt, as his wife. No change was made in the interior economy of the house, the pair and the servants living entirely to themselves, having only such communication with the neighbors as was absolutely necessary. Affairs went on in this wise for a year or more after the return of the gentleman with his wife, when one day

A YOUNG FELLOW RODE BY THE CABIN

where our informant then lived, and asked the direction to this house, which was given by himself. He noticed the young man particularly, and was struck by his remarkable resemblance to the wife of this gentleman. The young man thanked him for his information and rode on. He felt some interest in him, and quietly followed him to the house. The young man dismounted at the door, and knocked with his riding whip upon it. The man of the house answered the call, and, on seeing him, slammed the door in his face, exhibiting marks of great agitation. The stranger then applied for admittance, and, in response to his repeated knocks, the wife opened the door and came out into the yard. The two engaged in close consultation for some time, and then went into the house. Our informant says that he then went up to the house, and, inventing some excuse, went into the kitchen. No one was in the room, but, while waiting, he heard an altercation in the next room, and distinctly recognized the voice of the gentleman if he did not instantly leave the house, and never trouble him again. One of the servants then came in, and sternly ordered him out of the house, following him to the edge of the clearing, and watching him until he disappeared within the shade of the forest. Feeling convinced that something was wrong in the house, our narrator concealed himself within sight, and patiently awaited the turn of events. Nothing more happened at the time, however, and he finally went home. About midnight he was aroused from his bed by the sound of a horse's feet outside, and some one clamoring for admittance. He got up, and looking out of the window, saw by the light of the moon the stranger of the evening before, without. The young man, recognizing him, hurriedly said that he had just had a difficulty with the villain "over there," and that it had resulted in his killing him; that the man had run away with his sister from Virginia, and that his mother and father had died from grief in consequence, and that on their dying bed they had conjured him to seek out the author of the desolation that had come upon their home, and that he should exact vengeance from him.

THREATNING THE STRANGER WITH DEATH

Before our informant could unbar the door, the sound of horses, seemingly in pursuit, caused the young man to turn round, and, after listening for a moment, put spurs to his own horse, and, in spite of his shouts to him that he could take refuge within his house, the horse and its rider rapidly disappeared in the forest. A few moments afterward, two mounted men rode by, and followed the direction the first rider had taken. He heard nothing more until an hour afterward, when the two first returned with the horse of the stranger between them. They rode back through the woods in the direction of the "mansion," as it was called, and he then went again to bed.

The next day the report that the gentleman at the house had been murdered spread through the neighborhood, and some of the people round about visited the house. They were all repulsed at the door, no one being allowed admittance. Neither the gentleman, however, nor the stranger was ever again seen, nor could any trace of the latter be found. The times were not such as to demand especial examination of the facts in the case, and nothing ever came of it. The widow lived in the house for a few years afterwards with only the two servants as companions, and then left the neighborhood. The house was for a long time empty, but finally another party took possession of it, and it passed successfully through many hands, until about twenty years ago it was pulled down, and the lot has remained vacant ever since.

RUSSIA'S ACQUISITIONS.

A Review of the Startling Rapidity of Muscovite Progress.

The extent of the Russian acquisitions of territory in Central Asia is as little understood as the curious chapter, half of deliberate policy and half of accident, which contains the history of these acquisitions. The general statement that in a quarter of a century Russia has advanced her frontier 700 miles to the south and 900 miles to the southeast, gives but a vague impression of the startling rapidity of Muscovite progress. Russia is an empire of "magnificent distances," and the mention of its advancing frontier suggests the acquisition of barren steppes or frozen deserts. But it must be remembered that the parallel of latitude under which we live would about pass through the center of the Russian territories, in Western Turkestan. The three great Khanates—Bokhara, Khokand, and Khiva—which Russia has virtually absorbed during the present generation, have been the seats of highly civilized empires, and have formed the subject of contest between dynasties, whose names are among the foremost of Asiatic potentates. Genghiz Khan, the modern Attila, once ruled a vast dominion from Samarcand, which has now become a Russian municipality, and a successor of Timour, the Tureoman, founded the Empire of the Great Mogul in India.

Territories both wealthy and prosperous had, however, sunk into that peculiarly hopeless style of barbarism characteristic of the effete stages of Mussulman rule, long before Russia crossed the Kirghiz steppe, or began to continue her Siberian forts southward toward the Jaxartes. At every stage of her advance she has replaced the most debased forms of tyranny with a system of administration which, if tainted with the vices of military arrogance and civilian rapacity, is at least a guarantee of social security and an immense stride toward civilization. The ambition of her generals operating at immense distances from the central authority, and necessarily invested with very ample discretion in dealing with semi-barbarous foes, has had rather more to do with Russian advances in Asia than any steadfast line of policy traced at St. Petersburg. Nothing is more striking than the ridiculous smallness of the armies with which Russia has subjugated Turkestan. Tashkend was taken with less than 2,000 of an assaulting force, though the town contained 89,000 inhabitants and a garrison of 13,000 to 15,000 men, and so on with other celebrated actions of the last twenty years. The late expedition against Khiva was planned with more deliberation and carried out with a greater display of strength than any previous advance against the other Khanates. The causes which led to that expedition are, however, a fair sample of the reasons that have compelled the conquest of the surrounding States. As the civilized nation advance its protectorate, the tribes which it cowed became less fitted than before to resist the attacks of their independent neighbors, and in sheer self-defense the Russian outposts had to be pushed further and further into territories which were used chiefly for the concealment of organized bands of armed robbers. Or, the Envoys, the merchants, the soldiers of the advancing power were taken prisoners by some of the tribes beyond the line of conquest, and expeditions for their rescue and the punishment of their captors, led by a natural enough series of events, to permanent occupation.—New York Times.

Money and Commerce.

Daily Review.

OFFICE OMAHA DAILY BEE, July 9, 1874.

The banks are doing a good business; the money supply is good, and good paper finds ready accommodation. Not much doing in warrants to-day, and quotations remain the same. Money is comparatively easy, but still additional capital could be safely and profitably used, and with the promise of a large increase to our business this coming fall we know of no better place where it could be more safely invested.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK quotes:

Land Grants (selling)	$815.00
Land Warrants, (160 acres buying)	176.00
Land Warrants (160 acres selling)	185.00
Agricultural College Scrip, (160 acres buying)	176.00

Exchange on New York, 1-5 of one per ct.

The demand for groceries was quite heavy considering the season, the principle part of the trade being country orders. No change in quotations.

The produce market was fair, the demand exceeding the supply in regard to small fruits. Receipts of butter fair and the demand confined to local trade.

Hardware still continues in good demand at former figures.

There is not much demand for dry goods, prices ruling same and trade principally local.
