HARD LUCK.

Adventures of an Itinerant Pen and Ink Artist.

A young man, named after one of America's illustrious presidents, recently got into trouble at Plattsmouth. He follows the occupation of a card and ornamental sign-writer, being a most skillful penman. Some of his work in Omaha is evidence of his skill as an artist. He went to Plattsmouth and took several orders for advertising cards to be put up in the prominent business places of the city. To while away the evening hours of his stay in Plattsmouth, he managed to form the acquaintance of a girl employed in a doctor's house. He won her affections in a short time, and one night the doctor came home unexpecterlly, and surprised them. What the disciple of Æculapius saw so shocked his modesty, that he at once led the young man to the front door, and facilitated his progress into the street by the application of boot-leather. Going back into the house, he ordered the unfortunate girl to pack up her Saratoga trunk, and "git." She did so. Next morning the scandal had leaked out in some mysterious manner, and was the town talk. The itinerant pen-and-ink artist became frightened, and immediately came up to Omaha, without filling his orders for the display cards. Wednesday evening he was ar-

on a telegram from the Sheriff at Plattsmouth, who charged him with obtaining money under false pretenses. Thursday the Plattsmouth Sheriff came up and took him back with him. The young soon explained that had left town out fright, and that he had not had time to deliver the cards, owing to his hurried and unexpected departure, and as it appeared he had obtained no money for them, as they were not to be paid for till delivered and put up, he was discharged. The afternoon train from Plattsmouth brought him back to Omaha. He has'nt a very good opinion of Plattsmouth, for he was a stranger there and they took him in.
