STRATEGY OF A WIDOW

"That Mess Elists Davis is a charming girl and I consyntulate you highly, Mr. Norton," suid Mrs. Benton, "But what a pity that she seems so lealous," Warren Sorten dushed deeply. He reported Afric Accidents worse, but he knew that they were true.

overlares to Eigle, who had regarded her with suilen aversion from the moment of their introduction. However, the accomplished woman of the world soon managed to thaw the heart of the andisciplined, inexperienced girl.

"Yes, Warren is a dear boy," she said, "but like most men, I am afraid." "What do you mean by that?" demanded Elsie, flying to arms at once on John's behalf.

"I mean, dear, that a pretty face would turn his head. A man's heart may be loyal, but the best of them cannot resist passing attraction."

"It is not true!" cried Elsie, turning scarlet. "Unfortunately it is true, my dear," replied the widow, laying one hand caressingly upon her arm. "It is only too true, and I can prove it to you." "How?" demanded Elsie. "By bringing your Warren to my feet within two days," Mrs. Benton answered. "You can't do it," cried Elsie scornfully. "But I will let you try, Mrs. You shall sell your farm products Benton, and, if you succeed, I will Elsie did not go down to dinner that to buy everything of us, as we have night. But afterwards a feverish desire to see Warren again forced her to dress and go downstairs. She knew he was with that odious Benton woman, and she could not go away without torturing herself by seeing them together.

Poor Elsie reached the veranda just in time to see the couple disappearing together along the most secluded of the many beautiful walks of the Clen Pass. They were walking slowly side by side, and it was evident they did not dream that Elsie was anywhere near them. At the end of the walk was a hedge of box, round which the road wound into a pretty little summer house. Taking her stand behind the hedge, Elsie heard the conversation.

"Poor Elsie!" said Warren in a low "Poor Elsie!" said Mrs. Benton in a very meaning one, and Elsie, standing behind the hedge, set her teeth hard. To be pitied was the last thing that she could endure. "I feel guilty of disloyalty to her in having permitted you to plan this, Mrs. Benton," said Warren. "My dear boy, it is the best thing in the world for her," replied the elder woman. "A sharp lesson was necessary, and as the sister of your best friend, I feel that it is my duty to give her that lesson."

"She thinks I am in love with you," said Warren.

Mrs. Benton laughed merrily, "When my fiance, Mr. Boyd, arrives tomorrow she will be undeceived," she said. 'Now, Warren, a word of advice. I am going to tell her that it was all a plan of mine in order to bring her to reason and cure her absurd jealousy. You stay there till I come back, and I shall bring her with me.'

And she stepped off along another path toward the hotel, while Elsie heard herself sob in the darkness. What a fool she had been! She saw it now, she remembered all Warren's misery in the past, caused by her doubts of him. She was not worthy of him She-she-

Suddenly she fett two arms about her. Very miserably she raised her head Warren stood beside her.

"Elsie! You heard?" he eried. "O, what a fool I have been!" she "What a wretched jealous fool. I deserved this, Warren, to teach me to trust the man I love. Do you really love me, Warren?

Warren slipped the ring on her finger again. And in the consciousness of their new-born trust they were so absorbed in each other that kindly Mrs. Benton, approaching in the darkness, took a by-path back to the hotel
