where they were now.

CHAPTER IV.

The Consul's Story.

The business of any true American consul is to have known the father, or at least some relation, of any caller who comes from his own nation. Con-

Gray. And he knew-really knew-

"It's a grand little place, isn't it-don't know where it is or what it is!"

at her. "Well, my dear, rest assured thing, maybe; if it's stories you're after, you've come to the place where they grow, that's sure enough. Why,

Miss Kitty, the story of the king of

"Well, you see," replied Kitty,

when the big news story about the

when that came out I was put on the assignment of looking into Gretzhoffen

"The one that died? Yes, Michael

"You see, this Michael the Second is

with him. What Count Frederick has his own eye on the throne-we can't tell what may happen. I say it is a tense sort of place, Gretzhoffen.

king, is broke. Count Frederick, the Warwick of Gretzhoffen, also is broke.

That is why they tried to make a loan

"But they didn't seem to have the collateral-no unused revenues-nothing which had not been used or spent

"When Michael the First died, his treasury disappeared. He was rich, the old king was-rich in the name of Gretzhoffen. But the crown jewels.

treasures of all sorts, the imperial mintage of every description—they disappeared. There was rumor that the old king hid his treasures somewhere, but that he left some sort of a mysterious record by which they might

was left for that record. It is known,

however, or supposed, at least, that it was put into the possession of an old servant-one of the few men the old king trusted. But this man finally gave up some part of what he knew-

part of the proof, whatever it was-to the new king, when he himself was

"Between them, Count Frederick and Michael the Second bankrupted this about to die.

in our own country.

Gretzhoffen alone would fill a book."

when he was still living.

room.

From the Scenario by GRACE CUNARD

whole lot."

"I'm down to the last words now. I is curious-a proper name. It is only the Latin name of the kingdom of Gretzhoffen! That's a little bankrupt kingdom over in southern Europe, near the Mediterranean. I know about it-

I did a story about it once, the time in this country. I had to read up a

"I bet you could did it, Miss Cray,"

said Mainz, admiringly. "Vell, goothand. So intent was she on her pur-dropped the package containing the eyes and skin, strongly built, a figure such as one would note. He bowed thanked him and hurried on her way.

spoke in some foreign tongue to the

"Who is she? I know her very well.

Kitty Gray vos an oldt frent of mine.

She read like a book vot vos on the coin. Vy didn't you telephone-maybe she sell it back to you-I don't know.

She wouldn't sold it back to me, I

CHAPTER II.

The Big Assignment.

place for luncheon that day. Instead

she hurried into a nearby delicatessen

shop and bought a sandwich, which she put in her handbag. After this she hurried on back to the office. Arrived there, without ceremony she went again to the desk of the city editor, and silently laid down before him

her empty purse, her antique fan, her

Cutler looked up with professional

"What makes you think so? Are

Kitty picked up the coin and showed

"See, it is broken quite across-more than a third of it gone. The inscription is Latin. It is not so much what is on the coin—it is what is off of it.

Perhaps it commemorates something."

"Commemorates what, Miss Gray?"

"Precisely-what? That's the story!"

the inscription. "'Sub' means 'under'

-what does it say?-under the bam-

"No. 'under the sidewalk' or the

"'Underneath the flagstone'

pavement' or 'floor'--'in the angle' or corner'-whatever that may be-

chamber of torture'-'room of tor-found treasures'-'of the king'-'of

"-'Of Gretzhoffen!' " concluded Kit

ty Gray. "You have not forgotten all that than society in the summer-

Billy Cutler, time-tried news man,

thought. "Wait a minute, please,"

sat at her own desk, the mysterious broken coin tight clutched in her hand. It seemed an hour before she saw the slender form of the city editor returning from the door which led to the office of the manager and publisher of the Evening Star. He looked at her thoughtfully as he approached.

"Three thousand dollars!" Kitty

"Expense money. Three months vacation. Full powers as missionary plenipotentiary of the Evening Star

to Gretzhoffen, ambassadress to any old place you happen to think of,

Miss Gray. I never knew the old man to go off his head before, but he has

Tugging at her heart the swift feeling that she was leaving her usual

modest and safe line of life to adventure upon something perhaps fateful-perhaps indeed fatal-Kitty Gray.

sober-faced, turned from the door of the Evening Star and walked clowly

toward the corner where customarily

She entered her apartment, cast one

she took her car for home.

He held out a check.

Gray's eyes grew larger.

"By Jove!" Cutler was studying at sandwich and her broken coin.

"That is my story," said she.

you seeing things, Miss Gray?"

calm.

objects?"

"Look here."

boo tree?"

time."

the room.

this time."

flagstone,' or 'floor.' "

Kitty Gray did not go to her usual know dot. Vot! you are going?"

old dealer, who shook his head.

who vent out.

find out, like a goot girl."

FIRST INSTALLMENT

CHAPTER I.

The Cryptic Coin.

Kitty Gray, crack reporter on the Evening Star, pulled out of her typewriter the last sheet of paper and piled it on the little heap of finished copy which lay at her right. Then she closed her desk, stepped to the wardrobe and took her coat and hat.

Taking her little collection of copy paper from the desk, with the privilege of long tenure in office she walked to the desk of the city editor, who, although himself a married man, had all this time without success tried to look at the work before him and not at the trim figure of Kitty Gray making ready for her luncheon journey.

open air, she turned back, and almost "When will you deign to return?" ran into a man who had passed her asked he with a certain lapse in jouras she came out. He was a foreignnalistic dignity.

When I have a better story than this guff-in the vernacular."

Kitty's favorite lunching place was in one of the great department stores, where women were made welcome and comfortable, and she bent thither her steps: but midway in her journey she paused, as often she did, to gaze into the window of the little antique shop which occupied space in one of the unimportant side streets.

Kitty Gray's eyes were arrested by comething that she saw—an object which she did not recall ever before to have noted in the window. It lay plose to the glass, just titted back so that it might be the better seen. It apparently was an old coin or part of one, curiously done in some dark metal, probably silver badly oxidized

As Kitty bent down to examine it more closely, she saw that the coin bore an inscription, or what appeared to be such-an inscription broken across by the fracture which had divided the coin itself.

Her curiosity excited, Kitty Gray stepped into the little shop, whose proprietor she knew very well.

"Good morning, Mr. Mainz," she said with the customary newspaper inversion of the order of the day, "how's business? Any new fans, idols,

"Coins? Vot? Sure, I got somet'ing new dot is olt. I choost t'ink of him. He iss only a part of himselluf. Should

I show him to you?"

broken coin? "Sure. Vait till I got him."

She took up the coin now from the case, and some strange sort of thrill came over her as she did so, she could not tell why. What was its message, halting, broken, incomplete? Did it hold a story? What was the story?

"It's odd, isn't it?" said she, and laid it down again carelessly-with a carelessness well feigned, for Kitty Gray had bought antiques before now, and knew well enough when to suppress interest.

"Odt? I should say it vas odt," re joined the old dealer. Kitty had picked up an inlaid mother of pearl fan and was studiously examining that now. "How much?" asked she, holding up the fan. "For the broken coin?"

"No, the fan." "I vant twelf tollar for him."

"For the coin?"

"No, for the fan. For the coin-vat you gif me?" "Why, what earthly use would l have for a broken piece of metal like that, Mr. Mainz?" "Gif me for the fan eleven dollar, und I make you a present of the broken coin anyway." Kitty Gray's heart gave a sudden little jump. She would have given twice eleven dollars for the coin itself, but she made a good pretense.

"Eleven dollars is a good deal of money," said she. "I would have to go without lunch for quite a while." "You are a goot sport, Miss Cray," said the old dealer. "I dank you very mooch. I should wrap them up?" "The fan-yes. Let me see the coin again." She pushed across the counter almost the last of the tightly folded bills in her purse. "Read the inscription for me, and l knock off two tollars from the fan!" said Mains. "Vot is it? It is not Cherman, it is not Franzoesisch, it is not English. I am all those. But I could not read him."

Kitty held before her the curious object, a slight frown puckering her

"Well, you see," said she, "it is broken right across on the right hand side almost a third of the writing is gone. It says something about looking for something under the floor, under the pavement of some place of torture or torment."

"Und vot next?" "Thesaur'-that word's broken gross, but it must mean 'thesaurus' that means 'a collection'-a 'collection of value, don't you know?

The next line is one word; it's all "Regia," she went on. "That's Rex - regis'-it means 'king's' 'of the king.' "The king's treasures" glance about the first little room, and then paused. The rug in the hall was turned over one corner-was it by accident? The pictures all hung on the walls, yet several were askew, and-the little wall-safe back of one of the pictures-which had held some small objects of little value, an old daguerreotype or two, some silver spoons, a few gold pieces which she had cherished-had been broken open. Its contents now lay upon the floor. Amazed, Kitty stooped and picked them up, one by one. Nothing was missing-even the gold coins were there. Nothing had been harmed, But who had done this, and why?"

CHAPTER II.

En Voyage.

The great liner Anne of Austria lay in her slip at the dock, her giant pulses just throbbing now and then. the kingdom was trying to float a loan Everywhere men and women were hurrying to and fro in the customary orderly confusion of the last few moments before the departure of an ocean steamer.

by. Come again und tell me vot you Calmly Kitty Gray passed on her way to the boat's office and asked for "Sure," said Kitty, and turned to her mail and her keys. leave, her coin clutched tightly in her

As she turned, she almost stumbled against a man who had just hurried chase that she did not notice she had aboard-a dark man, thickset, foreign in appearance. She had the strange shell-ribbed fan. Vaguely missing conviction that she had seen him besomething as she emerged into the

Then she turned to settle herself down in her quarters. So far as she knew, she had not an acquaintance looking individual, dark of hair and on the boat.

Now, oddly enough, she recalled the face of the stranger, the dark-visaged now courteously enough as he handed foreigner whom she had met at the her the package she had let fall. Kitty ship's office. Surely it must have been the same man who had handed her This stranger entered the shop and her package when she dropped it in the little antique shop! Why should he be on board this boat? Why should "No," said he, answering in English. he recognize her, remember her-for "I choost sold it—to dot young lady he had! Trust a woman to know that -he had-he did. Yes, he had known her. Again a cold feeling of appre-She is on der papers. Better look out hension clutched at Kitty Gray's stout or she put you in der paper sure. Miss little heart.

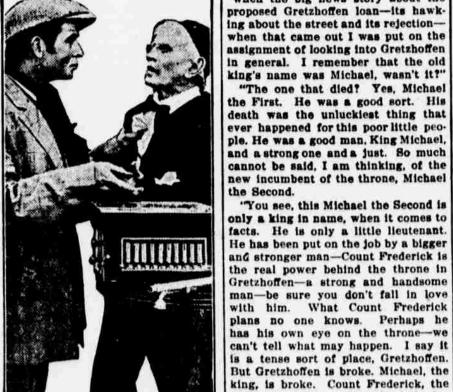

She rose and tried to fling off her depression by means of a visit to the dining saloon. But for some reason she felt she would be more comfort able-or safe-in her own room. Here she lay down upon the single berth, which was directly beneath the porthole.

She woke-she knew not when nor why-woke with her eyes staring, passing in her instant from sleep to waking.

A face was looking in upon her! A man had been looking at her, or trying to look at her, as she lay asleep. Kitty Gray's instinct spoke to her some message-she could not tell what. Swiftly she caught the chamois bag from her bosom, and, emptying its main treasures into her hand, placed them in that other treasure house of woman-her stocking. Again feeling the drowsiness invoked by the fresh "Yes, Miss Gray? Why all this or- salt air, at length she lay down once said Kitty, simling. "You mean the derly array of fresh and interesting more upon the little couch and rethat I will do all I can for you. And, signed herself more comfortably to between us, we ought to start some-

But again she woke-this time it was with a scream of terror. She had felt the touch of a hand. Something had tugged at her neck.

"What do you know of Gretzhoffen, She raised her hand. The chamanyhow?" he asked suddenly. "You ois bag was gone-it was the jerk said you had written about it. I supof the broken silk cord that had pose-"

"I Choost Sold It to Dot Young Lady

awakened her! And there was the hand that had done it, a strong, dark or wasted. hand, full-veined, hairy. It still clutched the bag—it still was visible at the porthole. A ribbon end had entangled itself for just an instant in the porthole fastening—an instant long the imperial securities, the crown enough for Kitty to see what had been the hand that had committed this robbery.

But who was the robber himself? Quick as thought Kitty sprang to the door, ran down the deck, out the next deck door. The band was giving its irst saloon concert, and the decks were sparsely tenanted, it seemed. Far off towards the bow a man was passing-what man she could not say. He seemed neither to hurry nor to linger. She could not make out who it was, dared not hang upon him her own suspicion.

She turned to the captain now and made report of what had happened not once but twice; but even as she

"It's Odd, Isn't It?" She Said. chamois bag was worthless-it had was their oyster, and they opened it held only a kerchief, a bit of powder and scraped the shell.

"Now, in case the Count Frederick. puff, perhaps a little silver-nothing the big plunger, or his man Grahame, more. Her real treasures-she knew or the little King Michael the Sec-The captain was outraged at what ond, should ever get hold of the rehe learned when at length she gained maining clue to the whereabouts of old King Michael's treasury-pouf! admittance to his cabin. With marine -you know what would happen then. precision, he acted at once. From that time on all through the voyage, a There would, Miss Kitty, to quote a certain American ballad, 'be a hot boat detective stood at each end of the time in the old tow 1' in that case." passageway which led to Kitty's state-

"It's a story!" r id Kitty Gray, drawing a long bree n. But a troubled light No trace of any other robbery could came to her yes at the same time. be found, nor any clue by which the intruder could be identified. 'How will a fellow dig it out?" she asked whimsically.

CHAPTER V.

The Encounter.

Meanwhile, during the interview Kitty Gray had with the American consul, a scene of other import was enacting elsewhere in the Gretzhoffen capital. sul Jethro Thompson of Ohio, cast away in the melancholy enterprise of In the interior of a white marble representing the dignity of this repub- fronted palace, perhaps a mile or so distant from the humble quarters of lio in this small and none-too-wellthe American consulate, a tall, dark, known principality of Gretzhoffen, was glad-really glad-to see Miss Kitty imperious man was pacing up and down restlessly, his eyes now and her father, or had done so at the time again turned upon the door of the great apartment, as though he expected someone to enter. At length the door did open. A soft-footed servant Gretzhoffen?" said Kitty smiling. "I've read about it-and written about itappeared.

before now. But this isn't a vacation. 'Monsieur Roleau, excellency," he really. I am on a big assignment, Mr. announced.

"What, Roleau!" exclaimed the tall Consul. I may want your help-the man impetuously, as the visitor enonly trouble is, I don't know what I do want to do-I am after a story, and I tered. "What has kept you? The ship docked hours ago. And have you got The gaunt, kindly old man smiled it? Come, come, man!"

The individual addressed as Roleau bowed deeply. "Excellency," he said, "I came as soon as I could be sure I yould not be watched

He was a man of dark complexion. of strong and sturdy build, of broad shoulders and deep chest-a man half a giant, one would have said-but his eyes dropped as they met the stern gaze of him he addressed, as though he might have been his master. "You found it-you succeeded, then

-tell me!" "Excellency—sire—yes."

The newcomer extended a hand which trembled slightly. "I swear it was in this bag"-he was offering a little chamois bag tied with a ribbon at the top-a bag which apparently had been once suspended by the broken silk cord attached to it.

"You say it was in this bag-then why not now?"

The tall man caught the little receptacle from the other's handsripped it wide-shook out the contents. There fell into his hand upon the table near which he stood, only a few trinkets of a woman's tollet-a little dainty handkerchief-a coin, yes,

The tall man held this up in his hand, his face distorted with rage. "What! a half-dollar of their cursed money! Curse you!" He half shrieked, and as he did so flung the piece full in the other's face, with such violence that the skin broke under its implans no one knows. Perhaps he

"The coin!" went on the enraged speaker-"what do you mean? Do you mock me, Frederick, your real monarch? You shall die for this. You have failed-you have not found ityou have lost it!"

His own eyes half starting from his head in his anger, he strode forward and caught the throat of Roleau in his two mighty hands, shaking him as he would have shaken a child. "Go!" he said, and flung him toward the door.

It was as Kitty Gray, after leaving the American consulate, was speeding toward her hotel in her hired vehicle that she caught sight of a man staggering from the side entrance of a great mansion house of white marble front. He seemed to have escaped from some calamity-from an attempted robbery or murder. Without pausing to ponder upon propriety, she haltbe traced. No one knows just what | ed her vehicle and sprang out, hastening over to the sufferer, who stood at the edge of the curb. "What is wrong?" said she. "You are in trouble—you are hurt! Shall

I take you home-to some haspitalto the hotel? Come in, you are welcome."

The man looked at her mutely, hesitating. "Come, I will carry you where you like." She had him by the arm now, him into the door of her own vehicle and followed him.

"The Ritz, driver," she directed. And so, in the role of Samaritan, Kitty Gray made her second arrival that day at the stately hotel which she had selected as her own abode.

All through the ride the man at her side remained silent, suffering acutely. He turned his face away. Again there came to Kitty Gray the strange feeling that she felt something which she ought to recognize, she could not tell what. In truth, sympathy had the better of curiosity for the time. She did not examine her strange companion closely, only speaking to him an occasional word of sympathy and assurance. Suddenly remembering that she did not know who he was, and remembering also that her own conduct might be held as singular, she turned her companion over to the head porter of the hotel and hurried away to her own room.

Apparently the disfigured stranger remained at the hotel that night, for when, at eleven of the following morning, Kitty Gray emerged, properly arrayed for a morning ride, she saw the stranger in the hotel lobby, his face swathed in bandages. He seemed to be waiting for her approach, spoke to her some words in a tongue which she did not understand-then changed to French-and then to English.

"If mademoiselle would permit me," he said, "I might be of use, even as I am. I know the city. Might I act as courier for the time? I would show my gratitude, if mademoiselle regards it as proper for me thus to do

Kitty Gray, actuated by no definite purpose, but governed by the impulse which she trusted in her trade, turned suddenly toward the curb where stood her hired motor car, and motioned to the man to enter.

They passed on down the wide avenue of the capital, a strange coup! enough. Kitty looked curiously abou her, studiously examining everything she saw. Yes, the old city was beautiful, with its long lines of green trees, its stately edifices built by hands long stilled in death. Soon she began to find the need of a guide, and unobtrusively the muffled figure at her side quietly suggested the information he thought might be of service. He pointed out some of the other large hotelsmansion houses of this or that court official, the hall of justice, the city hall, the great cathedrals, the royal palace, the palace of the Count Fred-

"Yes," exclaimed Kitty Gray, "it was here that I found you yesterday. The hotel of the Count Frederick. I know, yes, but why-how did you-"

Her companion suddenly raised a hand, touched her arm gently, requesting silence.

A great car, splendidly equipped and driven at rushing speed, came out of the very side street on which Kitty Gray had found her companion on the previous day. In the car, his gloved hand resting on his stick, sat a tall man, erect, strikingly handsome in his own way, imperious of air and bold of gaze.

Kitty Gray did not notice that her companion had shrunk back low into the seat. Her own eyes met those of the occupant of the advancing car.

Kitty Gray was young and more than a little handsome. She had taken pains to turn herself out well as she might in view of the possible surroundings she might meet on her

"You Shall Die for This."

strange quest. To the bold eyes of the tall stranger she must have seemed fair enough to look upon, for suddenly, as he passed, he stared at her directly, bowed, raised his hat-yes, even smiled.

"Who was that man?" demanded Kitty Gray flercely of her companion. "He doesn't know me. And yet how like he looked to pictures I have seen. There was a man-an international spy, they said in our countrysome strange foreigner-at the time of the Gretzhoffen loan flasco. Yes, the two faces are strangely alike. Who is he?"

"Of the other I know nothing," re joined her companion; "but thisis the Count Frederick."

"Count Frederick-the pretender!" "Hush, mademoiselle, for God's sake hush! We do not dare-you must not dare." "Follow!" said Kitty Gray sharply "Now tell me more."

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Who West Out."

went she smiled grimly to herself. The kingdom, or at least Michael did. It and unsightly as he seemed, hurried