That Omaha recognizes where its prosperity comes from is shown by an Omaha writer who has a long article in The Van Norden Magazine for July, discussing the growth of western cities and holding Omaha up as a type. The writer is known to be in close personal touch with the business men of Omaha and has this to say as to why the city is doing such a tremendous business and erecting so many buildings costing from $200,000 to $1,000,000.
"Successful years in the industry of farming has increased the purchasing power of a vast number whose homes are scattered over Iowa, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Kansas, Colorado and Wyoming. Through this increase in the ability to buy goods, the prosperity of the rural districts made itself felt and presented to employers a commercial motive to employ labor and capital in producing goods which the farmers demand.
"Omaha is a great city because of the men who are making the farms of the West pay dividends; the intelligent young men who are rushing into the corn fields instead of into the professions, who are essential to the elasticity of commercial demand and whose prosperity means a rise in the standard of living.

The Deadly Mosquito.
Well may the thin-skinned race of man shudder and go wan as that shrill and triumphant war-cry, strikes the enlightened ear. It means war, pestilence and famine; it heralds the onslaught of an inconceivable host, armed with poisoned arrows: it is the rallying cry of a merciless and malignant horde, which slays and spares not—neither the nursing mother, nor the babe in her arms. Insomnia, blood-poison, malaria, elephantiasis, yellow fever are its allies; swarming in their billions, its warriors have stopped the progress of agriculture, depopulated whole great regions, ruined nations, overthrown the Roman Empire. In the United States alone, the death-roll of this insect army is greater than that of the Civil War.
First and for centuries the mosquito was merely a nuisance. Fat-witted man, sitting on the front-stoop of cliff-and-ave-dwelling, watted-but and marble palace, of a summer evening, has cried "Ouch!" smote himself sorely and jibbered that immemorial bromidian: "Well, he won't bite anybody else, anyhow."
Then the thin detectives of science, spying through thick glasses, risking and losing their own lives in the dangerous work, verified, at last, long harbored suspicions and brought home to the mosquito the certain proof of his crimes. Through the winged snake of Herodotus, and in no other way, whatsoever, are malaria, yellow fever and a number of other diseases communicated to man. The pest becomes a pestilence; the nuisance a flying scourge of the world—From "Tiny Scourge of the World," in the August Technical World Magazine.
