In nothing was he more thoroughly American than in his appreciation of the value and methods of advertising. The great belettered slabs of wooden chocolate spelling out his name have wearied the eyes of all civilized people, but his masterpiece in this line were naturally reserved for France. For years it has been at least impossible to stir abroad there without reading "De melleur chocolate est le chocolat Menier" as once it was impossible here to get the cabalistic legend "S. the tired retins. One day a Frenchman said to him that he liked his chocolate tolerably well, but it bad one fault,—it grew white as it grew old. Menier took the bull by the horns, and the next day every newspaper and dead-wall in Paris angrows old." It would be interesting to know how many million pounds of chocolate Menter have since been bought because of that remarkable quality. Whether Menier's chocolate does really grow white with sge, and whether other checolates do not do so as well, and whether doing so is or is not a recommendation, of course no-body ever knew. Menier was more than a mere manufacturer; he was, or thought he was, a statesman, his lobby being direct taxation, or the taxation of acquired property. One day he mounted the tribune in the assembly -he reached the eminence of a deputy after having first been an alderman of Paris—to defend his views and read a carefully prepared speech.
